GUINNESS

THE GUINNESS BOOK OF

WORLD SOCCER

2nd Edition

THE HISTORY OF THE GAME IN OVER 150 COUNTRIES

GUY OLIVER

Rarely can any work of reference have been so eagerly awaited as this updated and revised edition of The Guinness Book of World Soccer. Its debut edition (1992) broke new ground in single-volume coverage of football – no other book has attempted to record the world game in such breadth and depth.

Now fully updated and with the detail in many sections substantially enhanced, once again every corner of football around the world can be found in its 928 pages.

The history of the domestic game in each and every country is presented in quite breathtaking detail. Also included are comprehensive results histories of the World Cup, European Championship, European club competitions, African Nations Cup, South America's Copa Libertadores and Copa America, and many other tournaments; and for each major country there is a complete set of international results, with scorers, dates and venues.

The new Guinness Book of World Soccer is the international 'bible' football fans have been waiting for.

INTRODUCTION

Es entonces cuando se detecta el primer signo futbolistico: "Un juego que en la ribera practican marineros ingleses que corren tras una pelota." Poco a poco, y extendiéndose a lugares muy abiertos de Flores y Palermo, el juego fue ganando entusiasta apoyo de los jóvenes criollos, y aquellos ingleses locos no parecieron tanto.

Buenos Aires a fines de siglo

It was then that football first made its appearance: "A game that by the riverside many English sailors play running after a ball." Little by little, and extending to the more open areas of Flores and Palermo, the game began winning the enthusiastic support of the local youths, and those crazy English did not seem so crazy after all.

Buenos Aires at the end of the century

Most people who saw the first edition of The Guinness Record of World Soccer looked at me with a mixture of puzzlement and sympathy. "How long did it take you to write that?" they asked. El loco ingles, indeed. When I first had the idea to write the book in 1987, there was little on the market to guide the football supporter through the maze of football clubs and countries. Now there are a number, as football writing has flourished. And true to the origins of the game, much of this has come out of England. I am proud to be a part of a small but growing tradition that looks beyond the shores of this island.

Having written the first edition I thought most of the hard work had been done, but with political instability, especially in Europe, this second edition has had to reflect a changing geography. To cope with this, Europe remains the largest section of the book, with every new country represented. For both Europe and South America, I have also filled in gaps where information was missing from the first edition. This has meant restrictions on space, despite the increase in the number of pages. The planned expansion of both the African and Asian sections has had to be put on hold but will be included in the next edition.

I have been gratified by the response to the first edition, especially where people have pointed out where I have gone wrong or given me extra information. Any advice is always appreciated, especially in relation to Africa or Asia. If anyone has interesting anecdotes with regard to the history of football in those two continents, or indeed on anything, please write to me at Guinness Publishing.

Inevitably, the biggest source I have drawn on is the large number of books that are now on the market on world football. These range from desktop publications, to books like Mike Hammond's European Yearbook which is unparalleled in its season-by-season coverage of Europe. Also of note are the number of books on off-beat subjects emanating from Serge Van Hoof's Heart Books, especially the North and Latin American Yearbook. I have drawn heavily on these sources for the second edition and can recommend them to others who wish to go into greater depth on certain topics than I can hope to do in this one volume. Other publications which have proved invaluable are Salvatore Lo Presti's Annuario del Calcio Mondiale, Italy's answer to Rothmans though with a wider coverage of world events, and the number of publications by Andrzej Gowarzewski in Poland. There are also a number of outstanding new magazines available. For its Pan-African coverage, African Soccer is superb, whilst the Asian Football Confederation News does likewise for Asia.

Many people have helped me over the years, but with particular reference to this edition, I would like to thank Francesco Mascalchi for his generous advice, and Ahmed Laidi and Brynjar Selseth, both of whose efforts are greatly appreciated. Thanks also go to Tito Ticeran Guerra, Emmanuel Maradas and Mark Gleeson for their comments on Africa, and to Scott Gleba of CONCACAF. Thank you to those who have given me advice whilst on my travels filming for Futbol Mundial, and to everyone on Futbol Mundial: it's a great show to work on! To Felix, Mike, David and Mauricio, many thanks. Once again I would like to thank the numerous football associations which have provided information, and thanks are also due to Andreas Herren and his colleagues at FIFA.

On a personal note, apologies to my family and friends. Travelling with my job and then spending all my spare time in front of my computer has meant that I have become something of a stranger to them, a situation I hope to rectify. Once again thanks to Tom for sometimes putting up with a rather irritable flatmate! The biggest thanks go to Sharyn. Others might have given up on me a long time ago. Many thanks and all my love.

KEY TO THE CHAMPIONSHIP LISTINGS

For each European country's national championship, the listings include a code showing what format the championship was played under each year. For example, England's league goes under the code y from 1920 (42 games, 2 pts for a win), becomes y1 in 1982 (3 pts for a win), x1 in 1988 (40 games, still 3 pts for a win), v1 in 1989 (38 games) and reverts to y1 in 1992. WORLD SOCCER

The origin of the football we play today can be traced to a series of five meetings between 26 October and 8 December 1863. The first of these, the historic occasion at the Freemason's Tavern in London's Great Queen Street, was where the Football Association was formed and the initial set of laws drawn up. The split with rugby occurred in the last of the meetings as supporters of that code, led by the Blackheath club, withdrew, leaving the way free for the adoption of the first laws of Association Football.

The ancient origins of the game are more difficult to define, however, for kicking an object such as a stone on the ground is a natural thing to do. Exactly when this simple action of kicking was turned into a game involving more than one person has been the source of much study, and various ancient civilisations can lay claim to a game that resembles football.

The Ancient Chinese had a game called Tsu Chu, Tsu referring to the action of kicking, Chu to a stuffed ball of animal skin. Kemari was a Japanese game played at roughly the same time as Tsu Chu, nearly 3000 years ago. Its resemblance to modern-day football is strong – in pictures drawn of the game there are two bamboo posts which the players seem to be trying to kick the ball between.

The Romans and the Greeks also played ball games, the former playing a sport called Harpastum, the latter a sport called Episkyros. It has to be assumed that wherever the Greeks or Romans went they took the game with them and there is an argument that Harpastum is the origin of football in the British Isles.

Football of a kind was being played all around the world by the Middle Ages. William Fitzstephen in 1175 gives us the first account of 'the famous game of ball' on a Shrove Tuesday in London, a tradition that remains to this day in some parts of England. These games were often violent, lasted a whole day and involved hundreds of people chasing a ball across the countryside.

Elsewhere, in Brittany there was a game called la soule, in Italy giuoco del calcio fiorentino, in Chile pilimatun, in Patagonia tchoekah, whilst the eskimos are known to have played a game called aqsaqtuk.

It was in Britain, however, that these often chaotic games were transformed into a pastime more resembling the modern-day version, and this happened in the public schools of Victorian England. These aristocratic and very exclusive schools, there to educate the children of the English gentry, developed the game as a form of exercise.

Each school tended to have their own rules, and as pupils went on to university they found that they did not have any common rules to play by. In 1848 students at Cambridge, perplexed by all the different codes, drew up their own code and it is this that the rules of 1863 are loosely based on.

Football is now the most popular sport in the world due to a combination of events. The Football Association in London helped spread the new game around Britain at a time when the country was in the midst of an industrial revolution. The rural population was moving into the cities and they needed a form of entertainment. Football was, to borrow one of its own clichés, in the right place at the right time.

Even more crucial, however, was the fact that Britain was an imperial power and was spreading its influence around the world. The tradesmen and workers who had learnt the game in the cities were in high demand around the world for their skills as other countries sought to industrialise. Thus the railway workers, engineers, clerks and business owners were responsible for the spread of the game to Europe, South America and elsewhere.

Perhaps most important was the fact that football is in essence a simple game and, unlike rugby or cricket, easy to learn. Only in the countries which the British colonised such as India, Australia, New Zealand and parts of Africa, especially South Africa, did they take to rugby or cricket because the British presence was much more imposing. Football remained a sport much more associated with the British merchant class than its ruling class.

The formation in 1904 of the Fédération Internationale de Football Association, or FIFA as it is more commonly known, was a recognition of the inroads the game had made around the world. FIFA is now one of the largest international bodies, having as it does, more members than the United Nations. Some even claim that it has done a better job than the United Nations in bringing the world closer together. In football terms, it has been instrumental in making the game the world's favourite pastime, not just through staging events like the World Cup but also through its coaching courses which are taken to every corner of the globe.

As football spread out of Great Britain at the turn of the century, the French in particular were quick to recognise the need for a controlling organisation in order that all countries played to the same rules, and so on 21 May 1904, representatives from Belgium, France, Holland, Denmark, Spain, Sweden and Switzerland met in Paris and founded FIFA. None of the four British Associations were present, being somewhat sceptical of the level of football in these countries compared to that at home.

At the outset, FIFA's tasks were somewhat limited. In particular, it did not control the law-making process, and technically it still does not. This is left to the International Football Association Board, a strange body made up of 20 seats, 16 of which are reserved permanently for the four British Associations. The four remaining seats are filled by election for a fixed term from amongst other FIFA members.

As FIFA's membership has grown, so have its responsibilities. From being an organisation representing a small corner of Europe, with responsibilities amounting to the organisation of the Olympic Games football tournament, it is now a worldwide body with many different powers. These range from the control of the movement of players and administering referees to the organisation of various tournaments at both senior and youth level, as well as administering a range of Standing Committees that look into topics as diverse as sports medicine and proposed changes in the laws of the game.

By the beginning of the Second World War, membership had grown to over 50 countries, the bulk of whom were from either Europe or South America. After 1945 however, as the shackles of colonialism were thrown off by the countries of Africa and Asia, membership began to rise dramatically and by 1966 it had reached 130.

The leadership of FIFA mirrored this shifting trend. Stanley Rous, president from 1961 to 1974, had come to represent the old world, and although a very capable administrator and a man who devoted his life to spreading the game worldwide, he was eventually undone by those forces he helped unleash. In 1974, Joao Havelange was elected under the banner of change, with the backing of the African and Asian countries. FIFA is now a more overtly commercial organisation, and the 'New World' has become an integral part of the organisation, where once it was marginalised.

In the early 1950s, FIFA sanctioned the formation of continental football confederations for countries within defined geographical zones, and these have also helped increase the profile of the less well-established nations of the world, as well as providing a vehicle through which FIFA's policies can be implemented.

The 'parliament' of FIFA is its biennial congress, held at the venue of either the World Cup or Olympic Games. Issues are decided here on a one vote per country basis, irrespective of size or population. A three-fourths majority must be obtained in each vote. It is FIFA's intention to remain politically neutral, and given the turmoil of the 20th century, it has coped admirably.

The major problems for FIFA have been Israel and China. The Asian Football Confederation has been the most overtly political of the regional confederations. In 1976 both Israel and Taiwan were expelled 'with regret', as they were felt to be holding up progress. Israel's presence was causing a rift with the Arab nations who were starting to join the AFC in the 1970s, whilst Taiwan's membership meant the exclusion of China.

South Africa and the former Rhodesia proved to be another thorn in FIFA's side; both were eventually expelled in the early 1970s for contravening FIFA's anti-discrimination code.

FIFA is best known for the World Cup, the final tournament of which is held every four years in a designated country. It is open to every member of FIFA to participate, but despite this, not every country does enter. Many of the smaller nations prefer to take part in the Olympic Games or in FIFA's two junior tournaments. Part of the problem might be that African, Asian and Central American nations had only seven places in the final tournament of the World Cup until 1994, despite these continents having 112 members between them. The qualifying competition has therefore been a long process with, for many, very little prospect of reward at the end of it.

The unequal distribution of places does not occur in the Under-17 championship. Europe is restricted to just three entries, as are Africa, Asia and Central America, and it is worth noting that given equal opportunity, Africa has won two tournaments to Europe's one. The two junior championships and the World Cup for Women are indicative of the attempt since the 1970s to spread football to parts of the world where the game is less established. Tournaments have been staged in locations as diverse as China and Saudi Arabia, and in 2002 the senior World Cup will be held in Asia, breaking the traditional Europe-Americas stranglehold for the first time.

THE WORLD CUP

The World Cup is the pre-eminent tournament not only in football but perhaps in all sports. Only the Olympic Games can rival it for prestige and spectator interest. The final of each tournament reaches a worldwide audience, through television, of hundreds of millions and is seen in every corner of the globe.

The idea of a World Cup, mooted as early as 1904 when FIFA was formed, was 26 years in the making. With amateurism dominant in all but a select few countries, the football tournament of the Olympic Games was in most people's eyes the world championship of football, and this held true right up until the first World Cup was played.

The winners of the Olympic Tournament were regarded as World Champions, and with the possible exception of Belgium in 1920, the winners deserved that honour. Without doubt England were the pre-eminent world power prior to 1914, and they duly won the 1908 & 1912 Olympic titles. In the 1920s Uruguay twice won the Olympic title, and as if to prove a point, they won the very first World Cup, thus confirming their superiority.

After 1918, amateurism as the dominant concept in football was increasingly under threat. Countries such as Czechoslovakia in 1925 and Austria and Hungary in 1926, all major football powers at the time, introduced professionalism and therefore could no longer send their full international sides to the Olympics. There were also doubts as to the true amateur nature of the South American entrants. The issue of 'shamateurism' did much to damage the credibility of the tournament.

By the time of the 1928 FIFA congress in Amsterdam, Jules Rimet, the president of FIFA, knew that more countries would soon follow the example of Czechoslovakia, Austria and Hungary, and so along with Henri Delaunay, the general-secretary of the French Football Federation, he moved a motion that FIFA should organise a quadrennial championship, open to anyone, and this was passed by 25 votes to 5. Hugo Meisl along with Delaunay, Bonnet and Linnemann drew up the regulations and set about organising the first tournament. The French sculptor, Albert Lafleur, was commissioned to design a trophy, and the venue of the first tournament was decided upon at the 1929 FIFA congress in Barcelona.

THE 1ST WORLD CUP

HELD IN URUGUAY, 13TH - 30TH JULY 1930

Italy, Spain, Holland and Sweden all applied for the right to stage the tournament. Uruguay, however, were chosen ahead of the European quartet - they offered to pay everyone's travel and accommodation expenses, they were the current Olympic champions, and 1930, the date set for the tournament, would mark Uruguay's centenary as an independent nation.

In retrospect, the decision seems to have been a mistake. One by one the European nations withdrew citing domestic commitments and the long journey time as their reasons. When the tournament opened only four remained, and they were not considered to be amongst the strongest on the continent. None of the powerful central Europeans were represented, nor were the British.

Only France, Yugoslavia, Belgium and Romania made the journey, and they were joined by nine countries from the Americas. Of the South American contingent Uruguay, the hosts, were overwhelming favourites to reach the final along with Argentina. Brazil had not yet developed into the powerhouse that it would later become, whilst the other South Americans, Paraguay and Chile apart, had played little competitive football.

Uruguay had struggled to build a brand new stadium for the championships, and as the tournament got underway, the 93,000 capacity Centenary Stadium was not completely finished. The first match, however, was not scheduled to be played there, but in Penarol's Pocitos stadium, where on 13 July 1930 a crowd of 1,000 turned up to see France defeat Mexico 4-1.

The 13 nations were divided into four groups, and the four winners of each of these would advance to the semi-finals. This combination of a league and cup format was decided upon when it was realised that due to the withdrawals, a wholly knock-out system was not possible. A precedent had been set that was to shape the pattern of future World Cups.

In the event the semi-final line-up was a surprising one. Despite their opening win, the French did not make it past the first round, due mainly to a problem that would plague the entire history of the World Cup: bad refereeing decisions. After falling behind to an 81st minute goal in their next match, against Argentina, they seemed certain to score through Langiller only for the Brazilian referee to blow for full time some six minutes early! Realising his mistake, he restarted the game, but by then it was too late for the French. A defeat by Chile in their next game in a near-empty Centenary Stadium saw them sail for home unrewarded.

Argentina, after their good fortune against France, qualified with some ease for the last four. Playing a blend of rugged and skilful football, they cruised past the Mexicans, winning 6-3 having been 5-1 up, and beat Chile 3-1 in the crucial last game of the group. Before only 1000 supporters in the Centenary Stadium, Guillermo Stabile, the goalscoring sensation of the tournament, scored twice in the first 14 minutes to effectively seal the match.

The attendances were no better in Group 2. Only 800 turned up at Central Park, home of Nacional, to see Yugoslavia beat the Bolivians who were clearly out of their depth. Yugoslavia qualified after winning 2-1 against the Brazilians in the first game of the group. Both were relatively inexperienced sides, but Brazil were the seeded side in the group and had been expected to win.

Group 3 did not produce any surprises. By 18 July the Centenary Stadium was ready for use and 70,000 turned up for its inauguration on Independence day to witness a difficult 1-0 victory for the Uruguayans over Peru, who had already lost to Romania. The deciding game of the group was played four days later before a crowd of 80,000 and by half-time, playing what was to be regarded as the best football of the whole tournament, the Uruguayans had swept the Romanians aside scoring four goals without reply.

The semi-final line-up was completed by the real surprise of the tournament, the United States. In perhaps the first case of a World Cup side containing foreign nationals to boost its chances, the United States team seemed almost to be a 'Scottish XI' as the names of players like McGhee, Gallacher and Auld will testify. Belgium were easily disposed of in their first game, as were Paraguay in the second. The semi-finals were both well-attended and one-sided affairs, and the results meant that the final would be a repeat of the 1928 Olympic Games. Argentina defeated the Americans 6-1 in the first of the games, but their tactics were not to everybody's liking: Raphael Tracy, the American centre-half, had his leg broken after 10 minutes. Only 1-0 down at half-time, the United States collapsed in the second half in the face of some scintillating football from the Argentines.

Uruguay, on the other hand, had a much tougher game against Yugoslavia who scored first, were unlucky to have a goal disallowed when 2-1 down, and conceded their third after the ball had seemingly gone out of play. Like the Americans however, they collapsed in the second half. It was to become a familiar sight: the Yugoslavs so close to winning a tournament but falling just short of the finishing post.

The final could have gone either way. The two teams were very familiar with each other, playing as they had more times against each other than even England and Scotland had managed. Uruguay were the Olympic champions, but Argentina were the current South American champions. Home advantage in the end swayed the tie. Boats had been hired by large numbers of Argentines to take them the short trip across the River Plate from Buenos Aires to Montevideo, but the majority of fans in the Centenary Stadium were Uruguayans.

Despite the encouragement given to the home team, Argentina had the better of the first half and they led 2-1 at half time, though Stabile's goal after 37 minutes should have been disallowed for offside. The second half was a different story. Playing the type of football that had made them famous in Europe, Uruguay broke down the Argentine defence three times to steal a victory and Jose Nasazzi became the first captain to lift sport's most coveted trophy.

THE 2ND WORLD CUP
11TH JUNE 1933 - 10TH JUNE 1934

Italy was chosen as host for the 1934 competition. Again it was a strange choice of venue. If Montevideo had been too far away for most of the European nations, Italy posed another problem. Like all dictators, Mussolini was always on the lookout for a propaganda opportunity, and the World Cup provided him with the perfect vehicle.

FIFA's insistence that the World Cup was too big for one city alone swung the balance in favour of Italy. The Italian government offered to foot what promised to be a hefty bill. The political motives of the Italian government seemed to be a small price to pay for a tournament. Mussolini was not to be disappointed either. Fortunately for him Italy were at the height of their powers: between June 1930 and May 1948 they lost only one match played on home soil, and during the 1930s only seven altogether. It seemed predestined that Italy would win, and they did. Home advantage was not Italy's sole advantage.

Uruguay, still upset that so few Europeans had bothered to come to her tournament, refused to take part thus robbing the tournament of the defending champions. The losing finalists in 1930, Argentina, weakened the line-up further by sending a virtual 'C' team, in response to the Italians poaching three of their best players, Monti, Orsi and Guaita. Monti had even played in the 1930 final for Argentina. This time he would go one better and win in the final for Italy. Vittorio Pozzo, Italy's trainer, justified their inclusion on the grounds that they were of Italian ancestry, but Argentina were quite naturally unimpressed. They did not want to risk losing their best players to the Italian game so they simply were not sent.

The British were again not present. It is possible that either England or Scotland would have won the tournament, but both had suffered losses against Continental sides. Two weeks before the World Cup began England lost to both Hungary and Czechoslovakia in Budapest and Prague respectively, whilst Scotland, on their last trip to the continent in 1931, had lost 5-0 to the Austrians and 3-0 to the Italians.

Stockholm saw the first World Cup game played on European soil. On 11 June 1933 Sweden kicked off the World Cup qualifiers with a convincing 6-2 win over Estonia. Because the number of entrants was 31, qualifying rounds were needed to reduce the number of teams to 16 for the final tournament which was to be played on a purely knock-out basis. There were few surprises in the qualifying rounds except Yugoslavia's elimination at the hands of Switzerland and Romania.

This meant that two of the 1930 semi-finalists were not represented in Italy. March 16th 1934 was also an historic date as Egypt met Palestine in the first World Cup match to be played on African soil, whilst the return in Tel Aviv three weeks later saw the first on Asian soil. On 27 May 1934 the final tournament got underway, and all of the first round games were completed. After one day of competition there were no American representatives left. Argentina, Brazil and the USA all left for home, the first two having played just one match in the whole competition, their opponents in their qualifying groups having withdrawn.

The USA had at least played two games in Italy. Apart from their defeat by the hosts in the first round, they had played a qualifying game against Mexico in Rome three days before the tournament started. Mexico had therefore made the trip across the Atlantic only to be denied the opportunity to play in the competition proper.

The quarter-finals were played three days after the first round, and the hosts were lucky to qualify for the semi-finals. Having gone a goal behind to Spain, their equaliser seemed to have an element of foul play about it, as did most of the Italian play. In the replay the following day, Spain were forced to make seven changes due to injury and unsurprisingly lost 1-0, their cause again not being helped by a referee who seemed to favour the Italians.

The most intriguing tie of the round was that between Austria and Hungary. Both teams would have graced the final, but it was the Austrian 'Wunderteam' who stole the honours. In the previous three years, they had lost only to England and Czechoslovakia and were many people's favourites to win the title. The best game of the round, however, was Czechoslovakia's 3-2 win over Switzerland, the result of which was in doubt right until the final whistle.

The semi-finals pitted Italy against Austria and Czechoslovakia against Germany. The Italians had their Argentine forward Guaita to thank for their victory over the Austrians. Despite heavy pressure, Austria could not level his 19th minute goal. Italy were playing their third game in four days and were not expected to win, but win they did in front of a delighted Mussolini.

At the same time in Rome before a small crowd, Czechoslovakia were having little trouble in disposing of the Germans who could not match their skill or the goalscoring prowess of Oldrich Nejedly who scored a hat-trick. The final between Italy and Czechoslovakia was not played until a week later, but in the meantime that most dubious of fixtures, the third place play-off was used for the first time in a tournament. The Austrians did not have the heart for the game, a feature that has blighted so many of them since. Certainly the public of Naples could see little point in the game as only 7,000 bothered to turn up to see the Germans win 3-2.

For the final, Italy, with the crowd behind them and the great tactical awareness of Pozzo binding together some talented individuals, were slight favourites. In the event they almost lost. The Czechs had played and beaten the Italians often enough before not to be intimidated, and when they took the lead 20 minutes from time it looked all over for the Italians. Both Svoboda and Sobotka could have sealed the match shortly after, the latter hitting the post, but after 82 minutes Italy were again saved by an Argentinian. Orsi scored a freakish goal with a shot that he tried to repeat the following day for photographers but couldn't.

The match turned against the Czechs and in extra time Schiavio scored the winner. Stamina had in the end been the telling factor. The Italian captain, their goalkeeper Giampiero Combi, gratefully received the cup from an admiring Mussolini. All was well with Fascism it seemed. Two years later this myth would be further reinforced when it was Hitler's turn to host a propaganda event, the 1936 Berlin Olympics. Privately most wondered how good the Italians really were and if they would have won the tournament anywhere else and without their Argentine imports who had played so crucial a role.

THE 3RD WORLD CUP
16TH JUNE 1937 - 19TH JUNE 1938

The practice of alternating the World Cup between South America and Europe was broken at the 1936 FIFA congress in Berlin. Both Argentina and France had applied to host the next event. The Argentines were upset that the French were chosen and it would be another 20 years before they entered a team. With some justification they felt that Europe had let them down again. If nothing else, however, awarding the World Cup to France was a tacit recognition of their services to the competition.

The tournament was not, however, trouble free, held as it was under the shadow of war. The Spanish Civil War was at its height, Italy had invaded Abyssinia, whilst the Germans had marched into and taken the Rhineland and Austria. Austria had even qualified for the final tournament but was now no longer a separate country. They were withdrawn and as a result Sweden received a bye in the first round. The tournament also proved to be the most unrepresentative of all the World Cups ever held. Only three non-European countries entered. Two of them, Cuba and the Dutch East Indies, had no football heritage whatsoever. Only Brazil were serious contenders. Missing again were the 1930 champions Uruguay, as well as the British quartet who despite pleas from FIFA still would not enter.

Sweden once more got the qualifying tournament underway in Stockholm, this time beating the Finns 4-0. Again, the only surprise of the qualifiers was the elimination of the Yugoslavs, at the hands of Poland. Not surprisingly, no qualifying games were needed outside Europe and so after the shortest qualifying tournament in the history of the World Cup, the 16 teams gathered in France in June 1938.

The Fascist states were confident of victory, through either Germany or Italy. The Germans were involved in the opening game on 4 June but were outplayed by the Swiss who were unlucky not to win at the first attempt. Despite the presence in the German team of the best Austrians, Germany put in their worst World Cup performance to date in the replay, where they were beaten 4-2. In a round full of shocks and surprises, Cuba's 2-1 victory over Romania after a 3-3 draw was perhaps the biggest.

The defending champions Italy nearly fell at the first hurdle, but a goal in extra time by Silvio Piola saved their blushes against the plucky Norwegians, who had almost knocked them out in the semi-finals of the Olympic Games two years previously. The Italian team had only three survivors from the 1934 winning side, Monzeglio, Ferrari and Meazza, and it was undoubtedly a much better one, as they would prove in the latter rounds. The most sensational game of the tournament, perhaps even in the entire history of the competition, was the first round clash between Brazil and Poland. Two players scored four goals: Leonidas, Brazil's 'Black Diamond', scored a hat-trick before half-time, then Ernst Willimowski undid all of Leonidas' good work by himself scoring a hat-trick, his third after 88 minutes making the score 4-4. Both scored again in extra-time, but Romeo snatched the winner for Brazil.

The quarter-finals were less full of surprises though no less exciting than the previous round. The giant-killers of Switzerland and Cuba were both knocked out, Switzerland by the stylish Hungarians, the Cubans 8-0 by Sweden, thereby putting Romania's first round performance into perspective. At Colombes in Paris, before the largest crowd of the tournament, the holders knocked out the hosts. France were not a very strong side at the time and not even home advantage could give them the edge over Italy for whom Piola scored twice in the second half.

One game did stand out, however: the first of the two matches between Czechoslovakia and Brazil, a game which has become known as the 'Battle of Bordeaux'. Zeze Precopio of Brazil had been sent off early in the first half and the match never recovered. Both Machado of Brazil and Riha of Czechoslovakia were sent off just before half-time; Nejedly, Czechoslovakia's star forward, had his leg broken, whilst Planicka played in goal for the Czechs with a broken arm. Both were missing from the replay and this told as Brazil ran out 2-1 winners in a much milder game.

In the semi-finals Brazil were drawn against the Italians and so confident of victory were they that they rested Leonidas. This proved to be their downfall because without him they lacked any punch in front of goal. The Italians could hardly believe their luck and went on to win 2-1 with Meazza inspirational at the heart of the team, Brazil's only goal coming three minutes before the end. Not for the last time would Brazil suffer through over-confidence.

As Czechoslovakia had done in 1934, Hungary represented the finer side of football in the 1938 tournament. Zsengeller, Sarosi and Tikos were among the best pre-war footballers on the continent and all three scored in their impressive 5-1 victory in the other semi-final over the Swedes, who were simply outclassed as had Switzerland and the Dutch East Indies been in the previous rounds.

Hopes were high that the Hungarians could inflict on Italy their first World Cup defeat. They were certainly the more skilful side, but were often accused of lacking the killer punch, and so it proved in the final. Italy had put the game out of Hungary's reach by half-time, Colaussi's two goals and one from the star of the tournament, Piola, giving them a 3-1 lead. Though Sarosi reduced the Italian lead midway through the second half, the Hungarians could not break down a stout Italian defence again.

In a foretaste of the way they would play later on in the century, the Italians had simply 'shut up shop'. Forced to attack, the Hungarians gave away a fourth goal eight minutes from time, Piola's second of the game and fifth of the tournament. Pozzo's tactical genius had triumphed again as Meazza became the third different man to collect the famous trophy. Italy had now won the last three major championships they had entered. Two World Cups and the intervening Olympic Games had proved their worth as the top continental side, if not necessarily the best in the world.

THE 4TH WORLD CUP
2ND JUNE 1949 - 16TH JULY 1950

The Second World War put paid to the World Cup for 12 years. Brazil, Argentina and Germany had all made a bid for the 1942 tournament at FIFA's 1938 congress in Paris, but no decision was taken. At the next congress in Luxembourg in 1946, FIFA decided to hold the next tournament in 1949. They also decided to change the name of the tournament from the World Cup to the World Championship. The trophy was given the name of the Jules Rimet Cup in honour of its instigator. Legend has it that during the war, Rimet kept the trophy under his bed to hide it from the Germans.

As Brazil were the only applicants they were given the task of organising the 1949 tournament. Unlike Europe, football had carried on unabated in South America during the war years. Indeed, between the 1938 and 1950 World Cups, seven South American Championships had been played, the last of which, held in Brazil in May 1949, occupied the time originally intended for the World Cup but instead acted as a dress rehearsal for the tournament which had been put back a year.

The qualifying competition was the most disorganised ever and was plagued by withdrawals. Originally there were 32 entries, but Argentina, Ecuador and Peru pulled out before a ball had been kicked, as did Belgium and Austria. Turkey withdrew after they had qualified, as did Scotland. The Scots had come second in the British Home Championship, which acted as a qualifying group, but decided that as they had not finished top they would not enter. This would be the last World Cup where the British could afford to be so disdainful.

Uruguay returned, 20 years after their previous appearance, and for the first time the British quartet entered. For the first time also, the Far East was represented, though both Burma and India later withdrew. For the third World Cup running, Stockholm saw the first encounter of the competition, the Swedes this time playing host to the Republic of Ireland. Notable for their absence were the Communist countries of Europe, especially Hungary and Czechoslovakia. Germany, the defeated power in the European war, was also absent – they were not invited to take part.

Because of the withdrawals, FIFA invited France and Portugal, both of whom had been eliminated, to play in the final tournament. France accepted and were grouped with Uruguay and Bolivia but pulled out once they had seen their itinerary and the amount of travel it involved. The Brazilian organisers were roundly criticised, and the complaints were largely justified. Yugoslavia in particular were unhappy about their programme. Their first match against Switzerland was in Belo Horizonte, their second four days later in Porto Alegre and their third, the all-important game against Brazil, two days after that in Rio.

The other groups were not much better, Italy being the only team who did not have to change cities. The withdrawals had also left the ridiculous situation where one group had only two teams, despite the fact that two other groups both had four teams. Apart from these problems, the atmosphere of the tournament was good. The huge Maracana stadium had been specially built, though like the Centenary stadium in Uruguay 20 years before, it was not finished in time for the opening match between Brazil and Mexico.

A crowd of 81,000 were in a carnival mood as they welcomed Brazil, the overwhelming favourites to win the tournament, onto the pitch. There, a 21-gun salute awaited them as well as a firework display. In the game itself, the hosts had no trouble in sweeping aside the Mexicans, the hero of the side, Ademir, scoring two of their four goals. Switzerland and Mexico were no match for either Brazil or Yugoslavia, although the Swiss did hold the hosts to a draw in Sao Paulo. That result meant that Brazil had to beat the Yugoslavs to qualify for the next round. In Yugoslavia's previous appearance in a World Cup finals, in Montevideo in 1930, they had beaten Brazil to qualify for the semi-finals. The biggest crowd that had ever gathered for a World Cup game, 147,000, packed into the Maracana. This time the Brazilians were triumphant. Ademir after three minutes and Zizinho on the hour ensured their progression to the next round.

Group 2 produced one of the biggest upsets ever in the World Cup. England, regarded by many as the World's number one, had started the tournament well, beating Chile 2-0. In their next game they faced the United States, who in their first game had almost defeated Spain but conceded three goals in the last ten minutes to lose 3-1. In Belo Horizonte a small crowd of 10,000 gathered to see the 'inevitable' English victory. Instead they witnessed a result that was so unlikely that on receiving the news, some British newspapers thought there had been a printing mistake and listed the score as 10-1! Larry Gaetjens scored the only goal, and unlike their 1930s semi-final team, the American team in Brazil was almost entirely composed of American-born players. Haitian-born Gaetjens was a notable exception. Going into the last game both England and America still had a chance to qualify for the next round, but the Americans lost heavily to Chile whilst England went down to a Zarra goal in the game against Spain.

The other two groups comprised only four games in total, out of which Sweden and Uruguay qualified for the final pool. Sweden, relying on only three of their superb Olympic Games winning side of two years previously, inflicted a first World Cup defeat on the reigning champions Italy, whose squad had been decimated the previous year by the Superga air crash. It was the decisive game as Paraguay, who drew with the Swedes in the second match of the group, lost to Italy in the last. Uruguay had the easiest first round any team has ever had or is likely to have. Their record against Bolivia consisted of five wins out of six with a goal difference of 27 for and 5 against. The game in Belo Horizonte saw the Uruguayans add another eight to that total in convincing fashion.

Unlike any other World Cup, the 1950 tournament did not have a knock-out element and as a result did not actually have a final. Instead, the second round consisted of another group where the four 'semi-finalists' played each other once. It is fortunate therefore that the final game in the group also proved to be the decisive game and so is treated as the final.

Brazil were positively spellbinding in their first two games in the group. Sweden and Spain were swept aside with such arrogant ease that everyone was certain they would lift the Jules Rimet Trophy. Ademir, Zizinho, Jair, Chico and Friaca were in stunning form in front of goal. Uruguay, perceived to be their greatest threat, started off badly, drawing with Spain and only just beating Sweden.

Sweden beat Spain in a meaningless match in Sao Paulo to finish third in the tournament, whilst on the same day, a world record crowd of 199000 gathered in the Maracana expecting to see Brazil lift the cup in a game they did not even have to win. A draw, and therefore five points, would have been enough to see them through. After two minutes of the second half it looked as if they were home and dry. A pass from Ademir put Friaca through to open the scoring, but the dreaded over-confidence crept into the Brazilian game, a fact the Uruguayans exploited splendidly. The Brazilians could have fallen back into defence but they continued to attack. Obdulio Varela, the Uruguayan captain, and Victor Andrade, nephew of Jose Andrade of the 1930 winning team, were inspirational, as was Maspoli in goal. Uruguay equalised when Schiaffino converted a pass from Ghiggia who was having an excellent game on the wing.

Technically Brazil were still winning, but 11 minutes from the end the unimaginable happened. Running in from the touchline Ghiggia scored a lovely individual goal to seal the match for the Uruguayans. Uruguay had only entered the World Cup twice, but had won both times. Brazil had entered all four but were still without a title to their name. Nobody inside Brazil, or Montevideo for that matter, could quite believe it.

THE 5TH WORLD CUP

9TH MAY 1953 - 4TH JULY 1954

Switzerland was chosen to host the 1954 tournament at the same time that Brazil was awarded the 1950 tournament, at the 1946 FIFA congress in Luxembourg. Given the state of Europe at the time, Switzerland, which had remained neutral during the war, was the only candidate. Zurich was also the headquarters of FIFA, and 1954 marked their 50th anniversary. More teams entered than in 1950, but representation was still low outside Europe. West Germany returned as did the Eastern European bloc with the exception of the Soviet Union and Poland, but amongst the American nations the entries were few and far between. All but Venezuela had taken part in recent South American Championships, but only four could see fit to enter the World Cup. Argentina were again noticeable by their absence, their continued persecution complex denying the world the opportunity to see some of that continent's best footballers.

In Asia, both South Korea and Japan entered, but it is strange that more did not enter given that a month before their appearance in the World Cup, the Koreans starred in the 1954 Asian Games football tournament in Manila where 11 other countries were represented as well. If so many teams could make the trip to Manila, why did more not enter the world's premier tournament?

Asia's reluctance to join in may be mysterious, but Africa's was wholly understandable. Egypt was the only independent country that had organised football. Other countries tended to be part of either the French or British football associations, given their colonial status, and therefore were not entitled to enter. Furthermore, in an extraordinary episode, FIFA refused the entries of India, Peru, Vietnam, Cuba, Iceland, Bolivia and Costa Rica because their entries were either received too late or on the wrong forms!

Belgrade saw the first match of a qualifying tournament that saw several surprises, the most notable of which was the elimination of Spain by Turkey. The two countries were all square after three matches and for the first time lots were used to decide a tie. Spain were just beginning to dominate European club football, but as far as their national side was concerned, the 1950s was not to be their most successful era. Sweden were the other surprise elimination, losing both home and away to Belgium. This meant that both the third and fourth placed sides from the 1950 World Cup would not be present in Switzerland. Perhaps the third surprise was that although Scotland came second in their qualifying group behind England, this time they eagerly sent a team.

The formula adopted at the finals reverted to that of the 1930 tournament with two differences. Instead of just the group winners qualifying for the next round, they were joined by the runners-up. With eight teams left, a knock-out competition would then begin. This system would also be used for the next four World Cups. Curiously though, in Switzerland each team played only two first round matches. Each group had two seeds both of whose matches would be against the non-seeds in the group.

Not surprisingly, with each team playing only two first round games, play-offs were needed in two of the four groups. In Group 2, Hungary easily qualified for the quarter-finals having resoundingly thrashed both the South Koreans and the Germans. The Germans were accused of not playing to the spirit of the game by fielding a weakened team against the Hungarians, a match in which, crucially as it turned out, Puskas the Hungarian captain was injured. The Germans gambled that after losing to Hungary they could beat the Turks, who they had beaten in their first match, in a play-off. By doing this they would almost certainly avoid playing the fancied Brazilians, and this turned out to be the case.

Group 4 was a little less controversial, and for the second successive World Cup, Italy flopped. The Swiss surprisingly beat them 2-1 in an ill-tempered game; not for the first or last time, with luck not having gone their way, the Italians resorted to intimidatory tactics. Victory over Belgium and England's victory over Switzerland meant a play-off between the Italians and the Swiss, and once again the hosts surprised everyone. Tactically more advanced, they outplayed the Italians, and their 4-1 victory was far more convincing and deserved than their triumph of the previous week.

The other two groups were far more straightforward. Uruguay and Austria simply outplayed their opponents, Czechoslovakia and Scotland. Scotland's 7-0 defeat at the hands of the champions Uruguay was a particularly salutary experience for them, brushing away the last vestiges of their 'Ivory Tower' attitude.

In Group 1, the French never recovered from losing the opening game of the tournament to the talented Yugoslavs, whose team consisted almost entirely of the one that had reached the final of the Helsinki Olympic Games two years previously. Brazil easily defeated Mexico in their opening game, which meant that a draw between the Yugoslavs and the Brazilians when they met in the next game would be sufficient to see them both through. Surprise surprise, the result? A draw.

The quarter-finals continued the high scoring pattern of the tournament. The most extraordinary game of them all was Austria's 7-5 victory over the hosts. Losing 3-0 after 23 minutes, the Austrians must have thought it was all over, but ten minutes later they were winning 5-3! All 12 goals came in the space of an hour. The Austrian team, considered too young to enter the previous World Cup, were putting on a splendid performance in Switzerland. Yugoslavia, faced for the first time in a World Cup by their jinx team, West Germany, dominated the game but could not break down a solid German defence. The Germans scored right at the beginning and the end of a match they really did not deserve to win. The other two quarter-finals pitted Europe against South America.

In the first encounter Uruguay, playing better football than they had done in winning the 1950 tournament, beat an English side handicapped by poor goalkeeping 4-2 in an entertaining game. The following day in Berne, Hungary beat Brazil by the same score but in a game marked by some disgraceful scenes. Commonly called the 'Battle of Berne', the game was plagued by vicious tackling from both sides, three sending-offs and a dressing-room brawl afterwards. Much of the blame was pinned on the Brazilians, fearful and finally distressed at their exit from the World Cup, but the Hungarians were not blameless.

The semi-finals thankfully were much calmer affairs, though no less intriguing. Germany reached the final and no one could understand quite how. Their 6-1 victory over Austria was very convincing but totally unexpected. The Austrians, marshalled by the excellent Ernst Ocwirk, one of the finest players in Europe, fell apart at the seams and the Germans swept up the pieces. Much of the blame has been laid at the feet of their goalkeeper Zeman who had previously been dropped because of lost confidence, but the Germans played some excellent football in the second half to totally demoralise the Austrians who had no answer.

The semi-final between Uruguay and Hungary has been called the finest game of football ever played by many of those present. Indeed it saw the Hungarians at their staggering best, and in the sort of form that had seen them undefeated since May 1950. Without doubt the Hungarian team was the finest to have played in the first five editions of the World Cup. The four goals scored against the Uruguayans took their total to 27 for the tournament in only four games played. Kocsis, Czibor and Hidegkuti were in devastating form and all three contributed to the goals.

Against anyone else, the Uruguayans would surely have qualified for the final. Schiaffino in particular had an excellent game, but there was nothing he or his teammates could do about Hungary's extra-time victory. With the score at 2-2 after 90 minutes and the South Americans visibly tiring, Hungary stole a victory. Nine minutes from the end, with Andrade receiving treatment for cramp, Kocsis put the Hungarians into the lead and he sealed it five minutes later with his second. Uruguay had lost for the first time in a World Cup match. They lost for the second time three days later in the dreaded third place play-off against Austria.

There have probably never been greater favourites to win the World Cup than Hungary in 1954, and yet amazingly they failed to do so. From 1950 to 1956 Hungary lost only one match and that was the most important of them all, the World Cup Final, against the apparent no-hopers from West Germany. After eight minutes of the game, even the Germans must have wondered why they had turned up. They were trailing 2-0 and on the precipice of a thrashing, but eight minutes later they were level.

Puskas, who had insisted on playing in the final despite injury, seemed to justify his inclusion at the expense of Budai when he put Hungary into the lead after six minutes, latching on to a Kocsis shot that had rebounded off a defender. Hungary's second goal two minutes later was the result of a dreadful mix-up between the German goalkeeper Turek and his defender Kohlmeyer who had tried to pass back to him. Czibor dispossessed them both and scored from close range.

Three minutes later Morlock was on the lucky end of a deflection by Bozsik. Schafer crossed from the left wing, Bozsik went for the ball but only succeeded in pushing it into Morlock's path and the German forward had no trouble in scoring. After 16 minutes, Rahn, the hero of the day, scored from a corner after Grosics in the Hungarian goal had misjudged the flight of the ball. Germany were level. For the rest of the game, played in pouring rain, Hungary attacked the German goal. Turek was in fine form making save after save. The post saved the Germans on two occasions, as did Kohlmeyer who cleared a Toth shot off the line. Five minutes before the end, Schafer broke away down the left wing. His cross was cleared but the ball fell to Rahn, who with four defenders in front of him made for goal.

Before he could be tackled he drove the ball perfectly into the corner of the goal. Grosics even at full stretch could not reach it. Totally against the run of play the West Germans had gone into the lead. Two minutes later Puskas was sure he had scored, but controversially it was ruled out for offside.

West Germany were the new world champions. For the second successive tournament the overwhelming favourites had been beaten in the final.

THE 6TH WORLD CUP
30TH SEPTEMBER 1956 - 29TH JUNE 1958

Sweden was chosen to host the 1958 World Cup and so once again the Europe-South America pattern had been broken. Indeed, out of the first six tournaments only two were held in South America. The entry was the biggest yet, but still represented under half of FIFA's total membership. Forty-eight countries played in the tournament as opposed to 36 four years previously. The qualifying rounds were once more full of shocks and this time political turmoil. Both Italy and Uruguay, who between them had won four of the five competitions played, failed to qualify. Portugal and ultimately Northern Ireland put paid to Italy's hopes, whilst Paraguay and Colombia between them saw that the Uruguayans did not make the trip to Sweden. Paraguay's 5-0 victory over Uruguay in Asuncion marked one of their best international performances ever.

The Uruguayans must have rued the return of the Argentines after a 24-year absence. Had their traditional enemies not returned, their passage to the finals would have been more likely because Paraguay would have been seeded into a different group. Argentina's return was generally welcomed, especially by those who had admired their victory in the 1957 South American Championship. That side, however, was disgracefully torn to pieces by the vulture-like Italian clubs and federation as yet again they ate up the best Argentina had to offer. Sivori, Angelillo, Maschio and Grillo all left their native land, and inexcusably the first three were picked to play for Italy. The loss of Sivori hurt Argentina most and they only just managed to qualify, having lost to Bolivia in the process.

Spain were the third of the big names not to qualify. With Di Stefano, another star Argentina had lost to Europe, and half of the all-conquering Real Madrid team in the side, they came second in their group behind Scotland. It was ironic that FIFA, having been put under pressure to change the system whereby the British Home Championship was used as a qualifying group because it guaranteed at least two places for British teams, sanctioned a change that ultimately led to all four of the British nations qualifying, a feat never since repeated.

Wales were the luckiest of the quartet. They had finished second in their group and been eliminated but political troubles in the Asia-Africa group soon gave them a second chance. South Korea and Ethiopia had both tried to enter the tournament but FIFA refused on the grounds that they had not applied properly. Now trouble involving Israel provided Wales with a second bite at the cherry.

In 1954, Israel had taken part in the European qualifying rounds. This time they did not and it turned out to be a mistake the organising committee should have avoided. One by one their opponents pulled out. Turkey, Indonesia, Egypt and Sudan, all Muslim countries, refused to play them. Only a year previously Egypt and Israel had been at war with each other!

Israel had therefore qualified for the finals without playing a game. This had happened to Hungary in the previous World Cup, and to others before that, but a new rule disallowed this. Lots were drawn among the European group runners-up to meet Israel in a play-off and Wales were the lucky winners.

The dominant forces in the European qualifying rounds had been the British and Eastern European sides, both of whom had four qualifiers each. A novel system was therefore used to construct the four groups for the final tournament. Each group would have one British, one Eastern European, one Western European and one South American team as there were four of each. This slightly arbitrary system produced groups of varying strengths.

The strongest without doubt was Group 4 which contained Brazil, the Soviet Union, England and Austria, all in good form although England had suffered a cruel blow losing vital players in the Munich air crash only four months previously. The weakest group contained the hosts, Wales, Mexico and a Hungary side depleted by mass defections after the 1956 uprising.

As the tournament got underway no-one was really quite prepared for the emergence of the team who were to steal most of the limelight. Brazil, adopting a tactical awareness not previously evident in their game, had moulded together a side of outstanding ball artists. One player however caught the headlines, further promoting the mystique of the Brazilian side. Pele, at the age of 17 then the youngest player to appear in the World Cup finals, became the first of football's worldwide superstars. Helped by the fact that television was covering the event for the first time, he was soon a household name around the world.

Winning their first game easily against the Austrians with two goals from another star in the making, Altafini, who would play for Italy in the next World Cup, they drew their next against England against whom they could not score - the first match, incidentally, ever to finish 0-0 in the World Cup finals.

For their final game, against the Soviets who had drawn with England and beaten Austria, the Brazilians brought in Pele, Garrincha and Zito for the first time. Before the highest attendance of the tournament, 51,000 in Gothenburg's Ullevi Stadium, Brazil made everyone sit up and take notice of them. Didi, the main creator of a team playing to a new 4-2-4 formation, led Brazil to a convincing victory, Vava scoring both of the goals.

Brazil's revolutionary new tactics took the Europeans in the group, who were still stuck on the old 2-3-5 system or variations of it, by surprise. Though they lost to Brazil, the Soviets qualified for the second round after a play-off victory over England.

Groups 1 and 3 also needed play-offs to see who would join the group winners in the quarter-finals, and in both ties British teams qualified at the expense of Eastern European sides. Wales beat Hungary, whilst Northern Ireland defeated Czechoslovakia. Britain was therefore represented by two teams, but not the two that everyone would have predicted. Scotland had a second successive disastrous tournament, finishing bottom of their group. Argentina, whose disappointments continued, also finished bottom of their group, obviously missing the players languishing in Italy.

Yugoslavia and France, though, qualified for the quarter-finals in style. Both were playing excellent football and were tipped to at least reach the semi-finals. This France did, destroying the Irish in a convincing performance in Norrköping. Fontaine, having scored six goals in the first round, added two more to his tally. Danny Blanchflower, the Irish captain, could do nothing to hold the rampant French at bay.

Yugoslavia, facing West Germany in the quarter-finals again, lost again. As in 1954 they were the better side, but the holders refused to give up their title without a struggle. An early Rahn goal meant that the Germans sat back and protected their lead for most of the match, but they were lucky to survive a penalty appeal for a foul on Milutinovic nine minutes before the end.

The Welsh, inspired by their goalkeeper Kelsey, and without the injured John Charles, put up the bravest fight of the round, holding the Brazilian attack for most of the match but eventually losing to a Pele goal 13 minutes from time. Sweden completed the semi-final line-up. They beat a weary Soviet side in the half-full Rasunda Stadium in Stockholm. One would have expected the Swedish public to be fully behind their team, but crowds in the tournament had generally been poor with the exception of Gothenburg.

Fortunately for Sweden that was where they played their semi-final against the Germans. Had the game been in Stockholm, they might never have recovered from Schafer's 21st minute goal, but the crowd, egged on by cheerleaders, got behind the team, which sufficiently intimidated the Germans. Skogland equalised after half an hour, but the turning point came when Juskowiak was sent off after 58 minutes. Sweden began to exploit the defensive gaps this created and the crowd, sensing a victory, urged them on. They had to wait until nine minutes from time, but two quick goals saw them through.

In the other semi-final, Brazil and France, the two most entertaining teams of the tournament, served up an excellent game. An injury to Jonquet, their centre-half, did not help the French cause, but the Brazilians were playing sensational football, and a 20-minute second-half hat-trick from the magnificent Pele sealed the game for Brazil.

The final therefore matched the hosts with the favourites. It seemed certain that the Brazilians would be the first team to win the prize outside of their own continent. Sweden, however, were starting to impress. The decision to let professional footballers playing abroad represent Sweden was paying dividends. Players like Nils Liedholm, Gunnar Gren, Kurt Hamrin, Nacka Skoglund, Gunnar Nordahl and Julli Gustavsson who had made the exodus to Italy after the 1948 Olympics and 1950 World Cup and had not been selected since were invited back to play in the team, once again under the control of the Englishman George Raynor. Without them, despite the presence of new talents like Agne Simonsson, they almost certainly would not have reached the final.

Brazil in the event were much too good for them once they got there, though they did fall behind to a fourth minute Liedholm goal. Worried that the Swedish crowd would be as intimidatory as in the semi-final, the Brazilians were pleasantly surprised by the quiet, friendly atmosphere in Stockholm and they took advantage of it. Five minutes after Sweden's goal, they equalised through Vava after Garrincha had crossed well. After half an hour Brazil scored an almost identical goal involving the same players to go into half-time leading 2-1.

As he had done in the semi-final against France, Pele stole the show in the second half. After 56 minutes, collecting the ball on his chest in the penalty area, he flicked the ball over the head of a Swedish defender, rounded the man and, the ball only having bounced once, shot Brazil into a 3-1 lead. Zagalo, destined to be Brazil's manager in the 1970 tournament, scored the fourth goal, running in from the left and beating two defenders in the process, but Pele was to have the last word. Zagalo, having provided the pass for Pele's first goal, did the same for his second, but not until he had first received the ball from the 17-year old courtesy of an arrogant backheel. This time Pele looped it into the net with his head. Sweden had put together a final rally before Pele scored during which Simonsson had reduced the deficit, but it was too little too late.

Brazil had won playing football to a standard rarely witnessed before. They won the admiration of all the Swedes in the stadium and as a gesture paraded a huge Swedish flag around the stadium at the end. They and France, who the previous day had beaten West Germany 6-3 to finish third, had both lit up what was by and large a lacklustre tournament played before relatively small crowds.

THE 7TH WORLD CUP
21ST AUGUST 1960 - 17TH JUNE 1962

Chile was awarded the 1962 World Cup at the 1956 FIFA congress in Lisbon in preference to both Argentina and Germany. It was a surprising choice. Both Uruguay and Brazil had hosted the tournament, and as the other member of the continent's 'big three', Argentina was confident of success. It had the stadia, Chile did not; it had an eager football public, Chile did not; and most important of all, it had a proud footballing heritage and Chile did not.

Not even a serious earthquake in May 1960, during which the damage and loss of life was widespread, could put the Chileans off their task. Carlos Dittborn, the president of the Chilean Football Federation, claimed, 'We have nothing, that is why we must have the World Cup,' when FIFA thought it might be a good idea to relocate the tournament, a phrase that has been immortalised in World Cup folklore. Unfortunately for Dittborn, he died a month before the tournament he had done so much to organise got off the ground. In his memory they named the stadium in Arica after him.

For the first time a non-European city saw the opening qualifying game, Costa Rica beating their traditional rivals Guatemala in San José, but again Mexico qualified from the Central American group. In one of a series of intercontinental play-offs, the Mexicans had to beat Paraguay to qualify for Chile and this they did.

The idea of playing qualification matches on an intercontinental basis has long been argued as being fairer and in the 1990s where standards have equalled out to a great degree this is probably true. In the 1962 tournament however, it left Africa and Asia without a representative. Spain defeated Morocco, Italy beat Israel and Yugoslavia knocked out the South Koreans. Yet again the World Cup finals did not have a representative from two continents that contained the majority of the world's population. With Chile as hosts and Brazil as holders only six qualifying games were needed in South America to whittle six countries down to three. Argentina and Uruguay had little trouble in disposing of Ecuador and Bolivia respectively, whilst Colombia, thanks to a 1-0 win in Bogota, knocked out Peru to qualify for the first time.

The European section did see a couple of shocks as the teams who had finished second and third in 1958 both failed to qualify. Sweden were knocked out after a play-off with Switzerland, despite having a better goal difference, whilst France lost to the fast emerging Bulgarians who forced a play-off after scoring a last minute goal in their last group match against the French. Otherwise those who were expected to qualify did. Britain was represented only by England this time, Scotland losing in a play-off with Czechoslovakia and Wales to Spain, whilst Northern Ireland finished second in their group behind West Germany. Of the eight quarter-finalists in Sweden, four failed to qualify for Chile. The only change in the format of the final tournament was the abolition of play-offs for teams that finished equal on points in second and third places. Instead goal difference would be used.

Group 1 was the most entertaining, played in far away Arica. The Soviet Union, the European champions, topped the standings followed by Yugoslavia, the team they had beaten to win the European title two years previously. Both were scoring freely, though the Soviets did have a scare in their second match against Colombia. Racing into a 3-0 lead after 11 minutes and leading 4-1 just into the second half, they then conceded three goals in the last 25 minutes and were lucky not to lose the game.

Group 2 was interesting, not for entertaining games but for the bad atmosphere amongst the teams, which sparked off the 'Battle of Santiago'. At the centre of the controversy were the Italians. Due to the constant poaching of players from the South American continent, the Italians were not the most popular team in Chile. Scouts from Italian clubs constantly plagued the training camps of other teams, while most controversially two Italian journalists covering the tournament sent home articles that were scathing about life in Chile.

Italy had begun the tournament against West Germany with a stale 0-0 draw before a large hostile crowd in Santiago. Three of their team were South Americans. Altafini had played for Brazil in 1958, whilst Sivori and Maschio were members of the famous 1957 Argentine side which had won the South American Championship.

In their next game the Italians faced the hosts before 66,000 extremely hostile fans in the Estadio Nacional. The game dissolved into absolute chaos which even the experienced referee, Ken Aston, could do little to control. He sent off the Italian Ferrini after eight minutes for retaliation but for 10 minutes Ferrini refused to leave the field, until FIFA officials and the police removed him. This was just the start of the trouble. A violent tackle by Maschio on Sanchez resulted in the Chilean forward breaking Maschio's nose with a punch seen on television around the world, but amazingly he stayed on the pitch as Aston had not seen it.

The tackling and histrionics were so bad that at one point Aston nearly abandoned the game. David, the Italian full back, was sent off in the second half for a head tackle on Sanchez, but it was not until 15 minutes from time that Chile could exploit their numerical advantage. Much to the crowd's delight Ramirez and Toro both scored to give the hosts a victory which ensured their qualification for the next round. Despite victory over Switzerland in their last game, the Battle of Santiago proved decisive for the Italians and they left for home. The World Cup was not proving a happy hunting ground for them in the post-war period.

Perhaps the most picturesque stadium the World Cup has ever seen is the Sausalito Stadium in Viña del Mar. Surrounded by woods on two sides and by the Pacific Ocean on the other two, the stadium played host to the group which contained both the eventual finalists as well as Spain and Mexico. Spain, like Italy, contained non-Spaniards in the team. Alfredo di Stefano finally had the chance to appear on the world stage that his talents so richly deserved. Alongside him was Puskas, the captain of the Hungary team eight years before. In the event an injury kept Di Stefano out of all three of Spain's games. Despite having a team of household names due to Real Madrid's exploits in the European Cup, Spain failed to perform and finished bottom of the group.

Brazil, with an almost unchanged team from Sweden, ran out easy winners despite losing Pele in their second match, against Czechoslovakia, with a torn muscle. The star of 1958 missed the rest of the tournament, though as Brazil proved, they had many replacements up their sleeve. Attendances were low in all of the groups with the exception of Group 2 in Santiago. The lowest of them all occurred in Rancagua at the stadium of the Braden Copper Company, where the average crowd was 7,000, as opposed to 8,000 in Arica and 13,000 at Viña del Mar. Hungary, regaining some of their pre-1956 strength, easily won the group.

The tie that decided the other qualifier from the group was England's 3-1 victory over Argentina. The Eastern Europeans were having a particularly fine tournament.

Four of the quarter-finalists hailed from behind the Iron Curtain, whilst only two came from each of Western Europe and South America. Both of the Western European sides lost. For the third tournament running Yugoslavia faced West Germany in the quarter-finals, only on this occasion they won. It was a close run thing but a Radakovic goal three minutes from time saw the Slavs through, much to their relief.

As this match was progressing the large crowd in the Estadio Nacional were all paying more attention via radios to Chile's match against the Soviet Union being played at the same time in Arica. Lev Yashin, the Soviet goalkeeper, played another bad game to follow that against Colombia in the first round. He was blamed for both of the goals that Chile scored, both of which were long range shots from Sanchez and Rojas respectively. Though it may have appeared a shock result, Reira, the trainer of Chile, had prepared the side for five years for the tournament, and although they had been inconsistent in their build-up, victories over West Germany and Hungary had hinted at the success that lay ahead in the finals.

Had Yashin played as well for the Soviets as Schroiff did for Czechoslovakia, the Soviets might well have progressed to the semi-finals, for Schroiff, generally regarded as an able but not brilliant goalkeeper, kept Hungary at bay for the whole match, which they should easily have won. Having taken an early lead, the Czechs were under pressure for the rest of the game. Hungary seemed to have equalised after 78 minutes, but Tichy's goal was surprisingly disallowed for offside.

The fourth quarter-final, between Brazil and England at Viña del Mar, was lit up by a dazzling display from Garrincha, no longer playing in the shadow of Pele. He was responsible for all three of Brazil's goals, scoring the first and third and creating the second. Hitchens equalised Garrincha's first-half goal to send the teams in level at half-time, but in the second half England were no match for the Brazilians who were beginning to sense that the World Cup would be theirs again, and that this game would represent their toughest test.

Brazil's game in the semi-final, in contrast to their quarter-final, was a one-sided affair. The hosts were no match for the champions, despite the largest crowd of the tournament willing them on. After half an hour Brazil were 2-0 up, both goals coming from Garrincha, and although Toro pulled a goal back just before half-time, Vava put the issue beyond doubt just after the break. A Sanchez penalty on the hour gave the Chilean fans a brief moment of hope but Vava soon ended that with his second goal. Brazil had Garrincha sent off near the end for retaliation and for a while it seemed as though he might miss the final.

The other semi-final was inexplicably played before the second lowest crowd of the tournament. Only 5890 people turned out in Viña del Mar to watch Czechoslovakia double the amount of goals they had scored in the tournament. Again their defence was solid and Schroiff inspired. After a goalless first half, Kadraba put the Czechs into the lead just after the restart. When Jerkovic levelled the scores for Yugoslavia they seemed set to win, but Schroiff kept them at bay as he had done with the Hungarians in the quarter-finals. Two goals in the last ten minutes by Scherer, the second a penalty, took the Yugoslavs by surprise. Having scored with ease in the first round group, the Yugoslavs' old disease of dominating a match but never finishing the opposition off returned.

Undoubtedly Czechoslovakia were surprising finalists. Unlike their counterparts who had lost the 1934 final to Italy, they were not the most entertaining team in the tournament. Instead their strength was based on defence. Novak, Pluskal, Popluhar, Pospichal, Scherer and Masopust were all fine players but they were not a great attacking side. Brazil were, and with Garrincha reprieved after his sending-off, no-one gave the Czechs much hope. As they had done in Stockholm, Brazil conceded the first goal of the game: Masopust scored after 15 minutes, receiving a lovely defence-splitting pass from Scherer; but the Czech lead lasted only two minutes.

The hero of the previous two rounds, Schroiff, turned villain in the final. Amarildo scored Brazil's first goal from the edge of the penalty area and at the most acute of angles. Schroiff, expecting a cross, did not react fast enough. He was also out of position for Brazil's second goal which came midway through the second half. Up until then the Czechs had just about matched the Brazilians, but Zito's goal spelled their downfall. Amarildo was again involved. It was his lobbed cross from inside the penalty area which gave Zito a free header to score. The goal for which the Czechoslovakian keeper had to take most blame, however, was the third. Djalma Santos, out on the right wing, crossed the ball hopefully and high into the penalty area. Schroiff was there to collect it but he let it fall out of his hands straight to the feet of Vava who touched it into an empty net, and Brazil had won.

Four years previously Bellini had collected the trophy as captain. This time it was Mauro who had the honour.

THE 8TH WORLD CUP
24TH MAY 1964 - 30TH JULY 1966

For the first time post-war, the major Western European football nations put in serious bids to stage the World Cup. England emerged as the favourites over both Spain and West Germany, and at FIFA's 1960 congress in Rome they were chosen in a close vote over the Germans, the Spanish having withdrawn their bid at the last moment. The year 1963 marked the centenary of the founding of modern association football in London, so in a way England was being honoured for her part in the development of the game.

The number of entries totalled seventy, 21 more than for Chile. At last it seemed the world outside Europe and the Americas was beginning to take an interest in the competition. Alas, it was a false dawn. Out of the whole of Asia and Africa just North Korea and Australia ended up playing a game. The point of conflict was the allocation of just one finals place to cover the two continents. Justified in their anger to the extent that as a World Cup, the competition should represent the world and not just Europe and South America, the representatives of the two continents withdrew en masse. It is interesting to note, however, that only four teams from Asia had entered in the first place. One of these, North Korea, were the eventual qualifiers.

Holland kicked off the qualifying tournament with a match against Albania in Rotterdam. The Dutch had not qualified since 1938 and their luck was not about to change. The Swiss, one of Europe's weaker nations, qualified from this group. It would have been interesting to see how an African nation like Ghana or Nigeria would have fared in Switzerland's place, given their poor performance in the final tournament. Not that this group was the only weak-looking European group. To lose in the final of the World Cup seemed to be a bad omen for the next competition as Czechoslovakia, like Sweden before them, failed to qualify for England. Losing semi-finalists Yugoslavia, who seemed to blow either hot or cold, blew cold in this tournament, and they too failed to qualify. The rest of the groups went much to plan in Europe as they did in South America, where there were no surprises. No surprises either in Central America where Mexico once again qualified at the expense of her smaller neighbours.

Four months before the final tournament started, the Jules Rimet trophy was stolen whilst on display in Westminster. For a week it could not be located, but a dog called Pickles found it hidden under a bush in a London suburb. Who had stolen it and why they had hidden it under a bush will never be known, but Pickles became an overnight hero. It was a shame that when the same trophy was stolen again in 1984 from the offices of the Brazilian Football Federation, Pickles was not still alive! Instead, the thief, who was later caught, admitted that he had melted it down.

In the finals, the greatest talking point of the first round again involved Italy, and again they failed to qualify for the quarter-finals. Their conquerors this time were the North Koreans. The country that liked to think itself at the top of the football tree was humbled by a group of players who had no experience of competitive football in Asia, let alone at world level. The crowds in the North-East of England, where the Koreans were based, warmed to their guests, even though it looked certain after the first round of games in Group 4 that the Soviet Union and Italy would qualify. The Korean victory over Italy, courtesy of a goal by Pak Doo-ik, was possibly the greatest upset the World Cup has seen, and on their return to Italy, the Italian team were pelted with all manner of objects by disgusted fans.

The other groups produced only one surprise, the elimination of the champions Brazil. England was not a happy tournament for the Brazilians. Regarded as favourites, they never adapted to the conditions in the North-West or the tackling of the Bulgarian and Portuguese defenders. Although they defeated Bulgaria, Pele was injured and missed the next match against the Hungarians, a game in which the Magyars outplayed their South American opponents. Indeed the Hungarians had recovered from the traumas of ten years previously and were amongst the best teams in Europe. Portugal, making their World Cup debut, were also an outstanding side. Eusebio, a naturalised Mozambican, emerged as the star and top scorer of the tournament. He was instrumental in Portugal's victory over Brazil, a game in which Pele was again on the receiving end of some disgraceful tackles. After the game he threatened never to play again in the World Cup. Thankfully he was back four years later.

Group 2 did not manage the excitement of Brazil's group, but it contained three very highly-rated teams. Spain were the unlucky ones not to qualify, defeats by the two qualifiers, West Germany and Argentina, sealing their fate. Like Italy, the Spaniards were learning that success at club level could be a positive hindrance at national level, a fact England would learn in the 1970s.

England looked comfortable enough in qualifying from Group 1, probably the weakest of the four. None of their opponents were tipped to proceed far and after a sterile opening game with Uruguay, both France and Mexico were defeated with ease by the hosts in front of full houses at Wembley. In the quarter-finals they played Argentina who were confident of victory, but in a show of temper they spoiled what was potentially an excellent game. Their captain Rattín, in particular, behaved deplorably and when sent off he refused to go. Playing against ten men, all of whom seemed intent on avenging Rattín's dismissal, England deservedly won the game when Hurst headed home a cross from Martin Peters 12 minutes from time. That an Argentinian team containing players of the quality of Artime, Rattín, Onega, Albrecht and Mas should resort to intimidatory tactics was a shame, but it was to be a familiar sight over the next few years, particularly at club level.

South American cries of conspiracy against them were heightened further after the match between West Germany and Uruguay during which two Uruguayans were sent off. It was a match Uruguay could have won, but they reacted badly to German provocation, and with only nine men for most of the second half, they conceded three goals to add to the one the Germans had scored in the first. All manner of rumour circulated in South America following these two games. A German referee in the England-Argentina game had sent off an Argentinian, and an English referee in the West Germany-Uruguay game had sent off two Uruguayans. Not surprisingly, two and two was put together and the South American press came up with five.

Two of the strongest teams met at Roker Park, Sunderland, where two defensive errors by the Hungarians let the Soviets in to win. The Soviet Union defended well and Yashin in particular made up for the errors he had made four years previously with a fine performance to deny the Hungarians, who had most of the play.

Goodison Park in Liverpool witnessed an extraordinary game. After 22 minutes North Korea led Portugal 3-0, and had victory in their grasp. Had they had more international experience they might well have won, but instead of concentrating more on defence they went out for more goals. Marshalled by the brilliant Eusebio, Portugal regrouped and exploited the gaps in the Korean defence. After an hour the Portuguese led 4-3, all of the goals scored by Eusebio. The 5-3 victory was comfortable enough in the end, but if ever a match sealed two reputations, that of the Koreans and of Eusebio, this was it.

The semi-finals starkly contrasted each other. The Goodison Park spectators had witnessed two excellent matches, between Hungary and Brazil and North Korea and Portugal, but the semi-final encounter between the Soviet Union and West Germany was not in the same class. Haller scored for the Germans just before half-time and Beckenbauer made it 2-0 halfway through the second half, and although Porkujan scored just before the end, the game was never exciting.

Not so the game at Wembley between England and Portugal, which was an open encounter and one of the best games of the tournament. Bobby Charlton, the scorer of both England's goals, was in superb form. His second goal even merited handshakes from a couple of the Portuguese players. The final ten minutes were especially tense, after Bobby's brother Jackie handled the ball on the line and Eusebio scored from the penalty spot. Try as they might, Portugal could not equalise, and the sight of Eusebio leaving the field in tears after the game is one of the most poignant pictures in World Cup history.

West Germany were back for their first final in 12 years. For England it was their first in 54 years. Not since the 1912 Olympic Games had they progressed so far. Home advantage was being made to tell: Italy in 1934 had been the last host nation to win the tournament and England were to become the third, in somewhat controversial style. After Haller had put the Germans ahead on 12 minutes following a poor clearance from Wilson, England applied the pressure and six minutes later they were on level terms after a quickly taken free-kick by Bobby Moore was headed home by Geoff Hurst. It was not until 12 minutes from time that the English pressure told when Peters scored, following a shot from Hurst.

It looked as though the game was beyond West Germany and they left it very late to equalise. From a free-kick blasted into the penalty area by Emmerich, Weber prodded the ball home seconds before the final whistle was blown. In extra-time the match was effectively decided by one of the most talked about goals in the history of the World Cup. From a cross by Ball, Hurst, with his back to the goal, controlled the ball, turned and shot. The ball hit the underside of the bar and came down. Hunt, who was following in, turned away in celebration. Dienst, the Swiss referee, after consulting his Soviet linesman Bakhramov, blew his whistle for a goal. The Germans hotly disputed the decision and still do to this day. They point to the fact that Bakhramov was not really in a position to give a proper verdict.

The issue was put beyond doubt seconds before the end of extra time when Hurst ran on to a long clearance and scored with a lovely left-footed shot. England had deservedly won the World Cup in what had proved to be a very exciting game, and brought the highest honour the game has back to the country that gave the world the game in the first place.

THE 9TH WORLD CUP
19TH MAY 1968 - 21ST JUNE 1970

At the FIFA congress in Tokyo in 1964, FIFA surprisingly gave the 1970 World Cup to Mexico. Once again Argentina was overlooked and their delegation was furious. The conditions in Mexico were thought by many to be unsuitable, both in terms of the heat and altitude, but the persistent lobbying by the Mexican delegation won the day.

As it turned out, the 1970 Mexican World Cup will be remembered as perhaps the best tournament ever to be staged. For those who were not there, it was the first chance to see the tournament not only live on the television but also in colour, definitely a contributing factor to the mystique which has surrounded the tournament since.

After failing to secure the staging of the tournament, Argentina failed even to qualify. This perhaps was a blessing in disguise. The three previous World Club Championships between European and Argentinian sides had been marred by brutal behaviour on the pitch, mainly by the Argentines, though not exclusively. Mexico was spared such confrontations. Instead, South America was represented by three supremely gifted teams in Brazil, Uruguay and Peru. Peru in particular were a welcome sight. Managed by Didi, the former Brazilian midfielder, they were responsible for Argentina's demise thanks to a 1-0 victory in Lima and a 2-2 draw in Buenos Aires.

Peru's presence in the final tournament was threatened by an earthquake just before the tournament began, but that was nothing compared to the traumas of the CONCACAF qualifying tournament, where full-scale war was declared as a result of three matches between El Salvador and Honduras. Relations had been tense for many months between the two countries. Border disputes and the problems of Salvadoran migrant workers in Honduras just needed a spark to start the fire. That spark was provided when the two countries were drawn to play each other in the semi-finals of the qualifying group. After all three games that were played, rioting and border skirmishes ensued and finally all-out war, though remarkably there was little trouble during the games themselves. Known as the Fútbol War, over 2,000 lives were lost in the fighting.

There were disputes elsewhere in the qualifying competition, but thankfully not on the same scale. The North Koreans, hoping to repeat their 1966 success in Mexico, were forced to withdraw after refusing to play Israel, the eventual qualifiers from Asia. The Asian entry was again rather low, considering the fact that the Asian Games, Asian Cup and Asian Club Championship were regularly attracting a high number of entries. Only Japan and South Korea from the AFC bothered to enter.

For the first time since 1934, Africa was represented at the final tournament, this time by Morocco, who won a close run play-off against Nigeria and Sudan. Ghana, without question the best team on the continent, having appeared in the four previous Cup of Nations final ties, did not live up to their billing as favourites, Nigeria defeating them 2-1 in a crucial game in Ibadan.

Europe was full of surprises too. Eusebio could do no more than inspire Portugal to finish bottom of their qualifying group behind Romania. Also out were Hungary, the fourth of the quarter-finalists in 1966 who did not qualify for Mexico. They lost to Czechoslovakia, 4-1 in a play-off in Marseille. Spain once again failed to live up to her clubs' reputation, finishing third in a group which Yugoslavia, runners-up two years previously in the European Championships, were expected to win. Belgium surprised both countries by qualifying with some ease.

The final tournament was played at the hottest time of the year in Mexico, and quite inexcusably, due to television commitments, many of the games kicked off at midday. That the tournament produced any good football at all is a wonder, but it did: the standard was of the highest quality. Group 3 in particular served up a feast of games, the best of which was the game between the holders and Brazil in Guadalajara. England had a team that was regarded as better than their 1966 side, and the predictions were that the first round game with the Brazilians would be a rehearsal for the final. They were unlucky to lose to a goal by Jairzinho, but Banks had earlier kept a Pele header out by producing one of the best saves ever witnessed. Both teams qualified for the quarter-finals by beating both the Czechs and Romanians, who were no match.

Group 4 produced lots of goals and some excellent football. Morocco put up excellent displays against West Germany and Bulgaria, whilst Peru with Chumpitaz and Cubillas in excellent form saw off both the Moroccans and the Bulgarians. Bulgaria, often criticised as one of the most negative teams in Europe, even played their part, though they could not match the skill shown by the Germans for whom Gerd Müller was in devastating form. His seven goals in three games included hat-tricks against both Bulgaria and Peru.

Group 1, played in the most imposing football stadium in the world, the newly constructed Azteca, got off to a poor start with a tedious 0-0 draw between the hosts and the Soviet Union in the opening game. El Salvador and Belgium, the other two teams in the group, were no match for the Soviets or the Mexicans. Mexico, for years the whipping boys at each World Cup, were enjoying home advantage and were determined to make the most of it.

Group 2 was the poorest. Both Uruguay and Italy were expected to qualify, and this they did without much trouble. Italy, after beating Sweden 1-0, simply shut up shop and played out two 0-0 draws. The Italians were determined that there would be no repeat of the fiascos of the previous five World Cups. Uruguay were very tight defensively and although they lost against the Swedes in the last game, the Scandinavians needed to win by two goals to qualify. The one goal they did score came in the last minute.

The quarter-finals threw up a repeat of the 1966 final, and this time the West Germans gained a measure of revenge. England, missing Banks in goal through food poisoning, led 2-0 with 22 minutes remaining, but the Germans fought back magnificently and eventually won with a goal from Müller in the second period of extra-time. Ramsey, the England manager, has been blamed for substituting Bobby Charlton instead of Cooper, as has Peter Bonetti, Banks' replacement in goal, for a poor display, but West Germany, forced into attack, never lost the initiative once they had scored.

In Guadalajara, Brazil continued to delight the public there with another inspired display against Peru. Pele, in his fourth World Cup, was proving why he was regarded as the best footballer ever to play the game, but he was not the only star in the side. Rivelino, Tostao, Jairzinho and Gerson with Pele represented an attacking unit that has rarely, if ever, been equalled. Peru might well have qualified against any other of the quarter-finalists, and against Brazil, Cubillas scored a stunning goal after an excellent run by Sotil, but they could not match the overall quality of the Brazilians.

Uruguay, Brazil's opponents in the semi-finals, beat the Soviet Union in the quarter-finals with a hotly disputed goal three minutes from the end of extra-time. The Soviets were adamant that the ball went out of play before Esparrago put it in the net to win a game in which the Soviets were frustrated by the excellent Uruguayan defence. The game was played in a half-full Azteca stadium, and it would have made more sense to have moved the game to Toluca were Mexico and Italy played their quarter-final. Had the Mexicans played in the Azteca, not only would it have been a sell-out, but their chances of winning would have been improved. Instead, in front of only 24,000 in Toluca they floundered and lost badly, despite taking an early lead, to an Italian side that showed it could attack as well as it could defend. Rivera and Riva were in particularly fine form.

In the semi-final against West Germany three days later, the Italians continued in this vein, scoring four more goals. That they also let in three was astonishing given that Italian football was dominated by catenaccio at the time. Every tournament seems to throw up a real thriller of a game, and in Mexico this was it. The Italians scored after seven minutes and went on the defensive for the rest of the game, only for Schnellinger to score right at the death for the Germans. In extra-time the game came alive. Müller, the tournament's top scorer, put West Germany ahead only for Burgnich to equalise. Just before the end of the first period Riva put the Italians ahead again only for Müller to equalise. When Rivera scored to put Italy into the lead for the third time, West Germany had nothing left to give.

Brazil, still playing in Guadalajara in front of a crowd that were fiercely behind them, won the other semi-final in some style. Uruguay had played Brazil often enough not to be intimidated, and they took the lead through Cubilla after 19 minutes, a lead they kept right up to half-time. Just before the interval, however, the inevitable happened and Clodoaldo equalised. It was not until the last quarter of an hour that the Brazilian pressure paid off. Brazil were on a roll and there was nothing the Uruguayans could do to stop them. First Jairzinho and then Rivelino scored the goals that won the match for them.

The final, before a full house in the Azteca, was a match that showed football at its best. At stake was the permanent possession of the Jules Rimet trophy, both sides having won it twice before. Pele opened the scoring, thus matching Vava, the only other man who had scored in two World Cup Finals, when he headed home from Rivelino's cross. Italy pulled level just before half-time after careless play in the Brazilian defence let in Boninsegna to score, but Italian optimism that they could win the game proved a false hope.

Again Brazil left it to the last quarter of the match to convert their supremacy into goals. A brilliant left-footed shot by Gerson from outside the area put the Brazilians ahead. Gerson was again involved in the third goal as his high cross was headed down by Pele for Jairzinho to score a goal that made him the only player ever to have scored in every round of the World Cup. In fact he scored in every game Brazil played in Mexico. Brazil's last goal, just before the end, remains one of the best goals ever scored. Working the ball cleverly out from defence, a long ball found Jairzinho on the wing. He passed to Pele who with arrogant ease slipped the ball into the path of Carlos Alberto the captain. The first Albertosi in the Italian goal saw of the ball was when he retrieved it from the net.

A remarkable goal finished off a remarkable tournament for Brazil. They had conceded seven goals, but worked to the philosophy that as long as you scored more than you conceded you would win. The World Cup in Mexico should have been the spur to break the defensive mentality that was becoming prevalent in the game. Instead, systems were devised by coaches all over the world to stop the threat of a team playing like Brazil had done. Indeed Brazil themselves, four years later in an attempt to keep their crown played a defensive game designed to snuff out their opponents. The World Cup in Mexico therefore will be remembered as an oasis of attacking football in a time when the 0-0 draw was an ever more familiar scoreline.

THE 10TH WORLD CUP
14TH NOVEMBER 1971 - 7TH JULY 1974

As it was the turn of Europe to stage the 1974 World Cup, West Germany were the clear favourites and they were awarded the tournament at FIFA's 1968 congress in Mexico City. As with Mexico in 1968 and 1970, Germany had the honour of staging both the Olympic Games and then the World Cup within two years of each other. The space-age Olympic stadium in Munich was designated to stage the final, so there were no worries about the final venue being ready on time. The main worry was that of terrorism. During the Olympic Games in 1972, eleven Israeli athletes had been murdered by Palestinian terrorists, and consequently, even though Israel was not represented at the World Cup, security throughout the tournament was on a level never witnessed before.

A new trophy was also necessary, Brazil having been given permanent possession of the Jules Rimet Trophy. Football therefore lost, as did the Brazilians, literally, six years later, a beautiful, simple trophy and gained an ugly replacement, an 18-carat gold globe on an 18-carat gold pedestal.

Many famous names were not in Germany to fight for the new trophy, the most famous of which was England. Grouped with the Olympic champions Poland, England could do no more than draw with them at home, in a game marked by some fine goalkeeping by Tomaszewski in the Polish goal. Spain were also absent once again. Having finished level on points with Yugoslavia in their group they lost a play-off 1-0 in Frankfurt.

Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Austria, France and Portugal, all semi-finalists in previous tournaments, failed to qualify along with the Soviet Union, though the latter's exit from the competition was controversial. Forced to play-off against Chile, they drew the first leg in Moscow 0-0. The return leg, however, was due to be staged in the National Stadium in Santiago and with some justification the Soviets refused to play there.

Earlier in the year, during the coup which saw the Marxist President Allende ousted by the right-wing General Pinochet, thousands of people had been herded into the stadium and never seen again. Many, though not all, were communists, and the Soviets did not feel happy about playing a game of football in such surroundings. Despite pleas to play the game elsewhere, the Chileans refused, and on the appointed day took to the field in the National Stadium. In one of the most bizarre sights the World Cup has ever seen, Chile kicked off the game and scored in the empty net. As the Soviets were not there to restart the game, it was abandoned and awarded to Chile.

There were not many other surprises in the qualifying tournament, except perhaps the elimination of Mexico by Haiti in the CONCACAF group. Bolstered by countries from the Arab world, the number of entrants in Asia rose dramatically, though ultimately they were all disappointed as Australia won through the qualifying tournament after being given a hard fight by Iran, the Asian champions, and South Korea, who took the more robust Australians to a play-off in Hong Kong in the final round before losing to a solitary goal.

The number of entries in Africa rose dramatically as well, as sub-Saharan Africa joined in for the first time in numbers. The Arab countries of North Africa had always been the part of Africa most taken note of by the rest of the world – given its proximity to Europe – but with the qualification of Zaire the focus shifted further south. The Zaireans won a final group against Morocco and Zambia, and they were considered to be among the best on the continent. Three months before the final tournament in West Germany began, they were crowned African champions after beating Zambia in the final of the African Cup of Nations in Cairo.

The format of the final tournament was changed in an attempt to increase revenue. Instead of eight games from the second round onwards there would now be fourteen. Gone were the quarter-finals and semi-finals which were replaced by two groups of four, the winners of which would qualify for the final, with the runners-up contesting the third place play-off. The system was heavily criticised as there would only be one knock-out game, the final. Also changed, three days before the finals began, was the presidency of FIFA. Out went Sir Stanley Rous and in came Joao Havelange who had the support of the majority of members from Africa and Asia.

The first round threw up a very interesting pairing in Group 1. East Germany, appearing in the finals for the first time, were drawn in the same group as West Germany. Since the division of Germany after the war, the two had never met in an international. Surprisingly, the men from the East won the day through a Jurgen Sparwasser goal, though both sides had already qualified for the second round at the expense of the weak Australians and Chileans. It was the only time the two countries ever played each other in 45 years of separate existence.

The defending champions Brazil were not the same team as they had been four years previously. Gone were Pele, Gerson and Tostao, and gone also was the free-flowing football and spirit of 1970. Brazil did not go out to win the tournament, instead they tried to prevent the opposition from taking a title they thought was rightfully theirs. Goalless draws against both Yugoslavia and Scotland set the tone and although they qualified with Yugoslavia at the expense of Scotland it was only on goal difference, and one goal at that. Zaire performed creditably against both Brazil and Scotland, but unfortunately will always be remembered for their drubbing at the hands of Yugoslavia, who although they scored nine could easily have taken the total well into double figures.

If the 1974 World Cup is remembered for one aspect in particular, it is for the introduction into the vocabulary of the phrase 'Total Football'. The masters at playing it were Holland, who had qualified for the World Cup for the first time since 1938. It was not a form of tactics as such, but a system whereby players would not be stuck to one position on the pitch. To make it work, players had to be very versatile and Holland had such men. They were by general consent the most talented team in the tournament and they qualified for the second round with ease, along with Sweden. Uruguay failed to qualify as they, like Brazil, seemed intent on playing hard, defensive football.

Not so Argentina, South America's third representatives, who played attractive, open football in their group matches. They qualified along with Poland, the real surprise package of the tournament, in what was an exciting group. Haiti in particular nearly caused an upset when they raced into an early second-half lead against Italy, but the thought of North Korea no doubt spurred the Italians on and they eventually ran out winners. They did not qualify for the next round, however. In their third game they had to beat the Poles, who were much too good for them. If any solace for England was to be found, this was it.

The second round separated the two arch-exponents of total football, Holland and West Germany. Holland now had to get past the challenge of Brazil, who were considered their greatest threat. Argentina, though full of promise, had not matured into a world-beating side just yet, and they lost to both Holland and Brazil in their first two matches. East Germany did likewise, which meant that although technically there was no semi-final, the final tie of the group between Brazil and Holland was just that, though a superior goal difference meant that Holland only had to draw to qualify for the final.

Holland were not to be denied by the champions. Goals by Neeskens and Cruyff in the second half of a game that saw some over-the-top tackling from both sides, gave Holland their place in the final, a place they richly deserved. Krol, Neeskens, Van Hanegem, Rep, Haan and Cruyff were all masters of their trade, but they needed the dominating figure of Rinus Michels, the manager, to make them function as a unit. Without him they might not have even reached the finals. Larger than life egos among the players had threatened to destroy the very basis of the team, that of combining together.

The other second round group saw a similar 'semi-final' situation develop. Both Poland and West Germany won their first two matches, leaving the game between the two of them as the decider. Like Holland, however, the Germans knew they could rely on a draw, and this gave them the advantage. Poland, who had been considered fortunate to beat both the Swedes and Yugoslavia, were this time unfortunate to lose to the Germans. The game was played on a rain-soaked Frankfurt pitch and only some excellent goalkeeping by Maier kept Lato at bay. Twelve minutes from time, however, Müller, who had not played as well as he had in Mexico, scored the killer goal that saw the hosts through.

The final therefore matched two perfectly balanced teams and was built up as a contest between Cruyff and Beckenbauer, both of whom vied to inherit the title of the world's greatest footballer, a position Pele had held for what seemed like an eternity. Beckenbauer was building a fearsome reputation as a libero, a sweeper who unlike the Italian model was not confined to defensive duties. Instead Beckenbauer was used as a springboard for attacking moves as well as clearing up in defence. Cruyff was regarded as the more skilful of the two, a player who could either make or score goals.

Beckenbauer was the one who emerged triumphant on this occasion, though not before Cruyff had given the game a start that would not be forgotten. Holland kicked off and before a German player had touched the ball they were a goal up. A superb run by Cruyff from outside the penalty area ended up with him being upended by Hoeness in it. Neeskens scored from the penalty spot with barely a minute gone.

For the first quarter of the game West Germany simply were not in it, and had the Dutch bothered to press home their advantage, Germany would have been out of the game completely. After 25 minutes, however, they were back in it when Breitner scored from the second penalty of the game after Holzenbein had been tripped by Jansen. Two minutes before half-time West Germany took the lead. Müller, receiving the ball from Bonhof, showed lightning reactions in first stopping the pass and then retrieving the ball when it looked as though it had gone behind him.

Before any of the Dutch defenders had a chance to clear, the ball was in the back of the net. Try as they might in the second half, the Dutch could not score. Again Maier showed why he was considered to be the best goalkeeper in the world, saving well from Neeskens, but Holland had lost the momentum they had built up in the first half, and for the second time the World Cup was West Germany's. Beckenbauer became the first captain to lift the new FIFA trophy.

THE 11TH WORLD CUP
7TH MARCH 1976 - 25TH JUNE 1978

In 1978 the World Cup finally came to the home of South American football, Argentina. They had been awarded the tournament 12 years previously when no-one could foresee the problems that were to face the country in 1978. A brutal right-wing dictatorship under General Videla was busy terrorising its own people, many of whom simply 'disappeared' and were never seen again. Left-wing guerillas were in turn fighting back, and the country seemed to be on the verge of collapse. At one stage it seemed likely that the tournament would be relocated to Holland and Belgium as the threat of withdrawals became evident.

Despite these political problems, and concern that some of the stadia might not be ready on time, in the event the tournament passed off without incident off the field, helped by a truce tacitly agreed between the government and guerillas.

Both Uruguay and England failed to qualify. The former lost out to Bolivia in one of the biggest shocks in South American football history, the latter to Italy in a group that was decided on goal difference. Questions were asked about a system that allowed two former world champions to be grouped together in one group whilst another could contain Sweden, Switzerland and Norway, none of whom were relatively strong at the time. The Soviet Union were another established nation to miss out for the second time in a row, Hungary returning to the fold at their expense after a 12-year absence. The European champions Czechoslovakia were another surprise failure, and apart from West Germany, Holland and Italy, the European representation in Argentina did not look to be that strong.

Brazil were forced to play in the qualifying competition for only the second time in 20 years and along with Peru, qualified with relative ease. Despite knocking out the Uruguayans, who were ruing the missed chance to play so close to home, Bolivia could not beat off the challenge of Hungary in the intercontinental play-off; indeed they were trounced 6-0 in Budapest.

In Central America, Mexico made no mistake in qualifying, winning a tournament held in Mexico. To reach the finals, the Mexicans had to play nine games. Tunisia, who qualified from Africa, had to play ten, whilst Iran, Asia's representatives, had to play 12, double, and in some cases three times, the number required by most European nations. As the number of entries rose, it was evident that the number of places afforded Africa and Asia would have to rise in the future, and the 1978 World Cup was the last to be played to the 16-team formula.

Iran and Tunisia, especially, both strengthened the case for increased representation by playing well once in Argentina. Tunisia comfortably beat Mexico, narrowly lost against Poland and held the world champions West Germany to a goalless draw in a match that the North Africans needed to win to qualify for the second round. Instead it was the Poles and West Germans who qualified, but no longer would European teams play African sides and expect scores similar to Yugoslavia's 9-0 win four years previously.

Iran were expected to do better than Tunisia, dominating Asian football as they had for over ten years, but unfortunately for them they were grouped with Holland, who although they were without Cruyff who had temporarily retired, were still the favourites, along with the hosts, to win the tournament. Two penalties in a Rensenbrink hat-trick saw the Dutch beat Iran in the opening game of Group 4, but in their next game against Scotland, Iran, but for an extraordinary own goal, would have won. The much-fancied Peru made up the teams in Group 4 and they made sure the Iranians did not progress further.

Group 4 was in the event the most dramatic of the first round. Scotland needed to beat the Dutch by three clear goals in the final group game to qualify at their expense, and at one stage in the match, leading 3-1, they looked set to do it. After having played badly in the first two games, the Scots were turning on the style. The third goal in particular, a mazy dribble and shot by Gemmill, was possibly the best of the tournament. But a Rep goal 20 minutes from time put paid to any hopes they may have had.

Group 3 was the most dour, but was enlivened by an extraordinary refereeing decision in the match between Sweden and Brazil. With the scores at 1-1, Zico headed home a corner to seemingly win the match, but as the ball was sailing into the net, Clive Thomas the referee blew the whistle for full time. The Brazilians were furious but the result stood.

Playing in the same style that they had done in West Germany, Brazil drew their next game 0-0 with Spain, who once again did not have a happy tournament. The Austrians proved to be the surprise package, and although beaten by Brazil in the final game, they were already assured of their qualification. Argentina, based in the refurbished River Plate stadium, beat both Hungary and France, as did the Italians, based further down the coast in Mar del Plata. France however were no push-overs and with a young Platini in the side, showed promise that would stand them in good stead for the following World Cup. Argentina were spurred on by a partisan crowd, though in the final game against Italy, with nothing to play for, they lost 1-0 in an ill-tempered game, a result that left them in what looked like a marginally easier group for the second round, though the Argentine fans in the River Plate stadium had hoped for a win to keep their team in Buenos Aires.

Following the same system as four years previously, the second round was played in two groups of four, the winners of which would contest the final. The groups were divided almost exactly on continental lines. Along with Argentina were grouped Brazil and Peru as well as one European team, Poland, whilst Group A was a totally European affair.

Neither West Germany or Poland were of the same strength that had taken them to first and third places in 1974 and both flopped badly. Holland roundly disposed of the Austrians in their opening game whilst the Italians played out a 0-0 draw with the Germans, and although the Germans still had a mathematical chance of reaching the final going into the last game, courtesy of a draw against the Dutch, Austria saw to it that they would not. The game between Italy and Holland was therefore in effect a semi-final. Italy needed to win, whereas Holland could rely on a draw, and after 19 minutes a Brandts own goal put the Italians in the driving seat. The same player made amends early in the second half with a long range shot, an effort that Haan bettered after 75 minutes from even further out.

Group B was full of controversy as both Brazil and Argentina finished level on five points. Both had beaten Peru and Poland respectively in the opening games of the group, and they met in Rosario in the second set of games. No goals were scored in a highly charged game, which meant that if, as expected, Brazil beat Poland and Argentina beat Peru, goal difference would be needed to decide the finalists. In a piece of crass organisation, the Brazil-Poland game kicked off before the Argentina-Peru game which meant that the Argentinians knew exactly the result they needed.

The Brazilians cried cheat and they were largely justified. The organisers put the case that if Argentina played at the same time, no-one would go to the Brazil-Poland match, and they had a point; but the fact remained that the hosts derived a clear advantage. Knowing that they needed to win 4-1 at the very least, Argentina went even further than that, winning 6-0. To the accusations of bad organisation those of foul play were added, though Brazilian claims that the Peruvians had been bribed were totally unfounded. The final therefore was between the hosts and the runners-up of four years previously. Unfortunately for the Dutch, they joined both Czechoslovakia and Hungary as nations who had reached two finals and lost them both. Holland's misfortune was that on both occasions they lost to the hosts.

Had either of the finals been staged on neutral ground, they might well have won them. Ernst Happel was their manager in Argentina, and despite the absence of Cruyff, Van Hanegem, Van Beveren and Geels, he fashioned a side that looked capable of beating the Argentines, despite their home advantage. Argentina meanwhile, managed by the chain-smoking Menotti, had suffered the usual Argentine disease, players leaving Argentina for Europe. Of the exiles, only Kempes was recalled. Menotti decided to rely on home-based players, and the ploy worked.

Argentina won the final before a passionate crowd in the River Plate stadium in Buenos Aires. So much light blue and white confetti had been used to celebrate the home team's arrival on the pitch that at both ends it looked as if it had been snowing. Mario Kempes, leading the Argentine attack, played one of the best games of his life, and he opened the scoring in the 38th minute, cleverly touching home a pass from Luque. The Dutch, annoyed by Argentina's late arrival on the pitch at the beginning of the game, and by a protest about a bandage Rene Van de Kerkhof was wearing, did not approach the game with the right attitude.

The match was plagued by fouls and the referee seemed to have lost control, but Argentina hung onto their lead. In the last ten minutes, however, the Dutch nearly stole the match. Rene Van de Kerkhof beat the offside trap after an excellent through ball by Haan. He crossed and the substitute Nanninga was there to head home the equaliser. In the very last seconds of the game, Rensenbrink hit the post from close range after receiving a perfectly weighted long ball from Krol, and Holland's chance was gone. In extra time, with the crowd roaring them on, Argentina regrouped and went into the lead again. Kempes it was who scored, this time after a dazzling run from outside the penalty area during which he took on and beat three players, including the goalkeeper. Kempes was involved in Argentina's third goal as well. Setting off on another run he flicked the ball to Bertoni, Bertoni knocked it back, and it fortuitously came back off Kempes' chest for Bertoni to sweep it home.

Argentina had won a colourful and sometimes controversial tournament and deservedly so. None of the threatened problems had materialised. Having contributed so much to the game over the years, they finally had some tangible reward.

THE 12TH WORLD CUP
26TH MARCH 1980 - 11TH JULY 1982

As the hosts had won three of the previous four World Cups, Spain were regarded as among the favourites for the 1982 tournament. The Spanish league was among the best in the world, and although their track record in the tournament was not good, many felt that this could be the year when the Spanish national team finally made their mark, and that the run of home victories would continue. Joao Havelange kept his promise to increase the number of competitors in the final tournament, made at the time of his election. From 16 teams in most of the previous tournaments, the total rose to 24, a highly questionable number in that although it gave more representation to the developing world, the final tournament became protracted and unwieldy. Two rounds of league groups would be used to thin the number of competitors down to four semi-finalists, and then two finalists, all over the period of a month.

Africa and Asia might have each gained another place in the finals, but the real beneficiary of the increased size of the tournament was Europe which gained an extra four places to take its total to 13. As two teams instead of one now qualified from each group, the scope for surprises was drastically reduced. There was one, though: Holland's failure to make it to the finals. Suffering a downward turn in their fortunes after the successes of the 1970s, they missed out by a point to France and Belgium, though the Republic of Ireland were even more unlucky. They failed to qualify for their first finals on goal difference behind the French.

England and the Soviet Union both made welcome returns after missing West Germany and Argentina, and for the first time since 1958 more than one country from the British Isles was represented. Scotland and Northern Ireland came first and second respectively in their group and so only Wales were missing.

From South America, Uruguay were again absent despite the continent having four places in the finals, whilst from CONCACAF, Mexico were surprisingly eliminated by Honduras and El Salvador.

Both Africa and Asia had their representation doubled – to two each! Of the four who qualified, the Asian pair looked the weaker and so it proved. Kuwait were the current Asian champions. Oil money had seen a succession of European and South American coaches visit the rich city state and this had made the difference in turning them from an ordinary side into a good one, but one which was slightly out of its depth in Spain. New Zealand had qualified after defeating China in a play-off, but like the Kuwaitis, the All-Whites, as the New Zealand footballers were known, were clearly outclassed.

Not so Algeria or Cameroon. Neither qualified for the second round in the finals, but both deserved to. Cameroon, playing in Group 1 in the north-western towns of Vigo and La Coruña, were grouped with Italy, Poland and Peru. Poland were enjoying something of a revival. Zmuda, Lato and Boniek were still instrumental in the team and courtesy of a heavy win over a weak Peru, for whom Cubillas was still the most influential player, they won the group. All the other games finished as draws, but because Italy had been involved in two 1-1 draws as opposed to Cameroon's one, they qualified at the Africans' expense. That Cameroon should lose out to the eventual champions only on goal difference served as a warning that Africa had arrived.

Events in Group 2 provided further proof, if any were needed. Algeria were denied a place in the second round courtesy of inexcusably inept organisation on FIFA's behalf and a blatant piece of cheating by the West Germans and the Austrians. Algeria beat the Germans in the opening game of the group in Gijón, a result likened to North Korea's victory over Italy and America's victory over England in previous World Cups. In their second game the Algerians faltered, losing to Austria who thus effectively qualified having beaten the hapless Chileans in their first game. West Germany's victory over Chile left them with two points from their first two games, like Algeria.

FIFA obviously had not learnt the lessons of the Argentina-Peru match four years previously, because Algeria played against Chile the day before the Germans and the Austrians met. Chile were beaten in an exciting game, once again marked by the quality of the Algerian players. Missing Belloumi, the star of the game against Germany, they were now inspired by Madjer and raced into a 3-0 half-time lead. Had the result stayed that way, all of the controversy of the following day would have been avoided, but the Algerians conceded two second-half goals.

The following day therefore, West Germany knew that a 1-0 win would put them through whilst the same score would also see the Austrians through. What has become known as the 'Great Gijón Swindle' or 'Anschluss' saw the game finish with just that result. After the Germans had taken an early lead, both teams might just as well have left the field, so little football was played. The Algerians were outraged. They immediately appealed to FIFA, who limply did nothing, knowing full well that ultimately it was they who were the culprits, for not insisting that the final games in each group were played simultaneously. Mindful of their mistake they implemented just such a policy four years later in Mexico.

In Group 3, the champions Argentina were beaten in the opening game of the tournament by Belgium, but both these two qualified at the expense of Hungary who, despite a 10-1 victory over El Salvador and a draw with Belgium, could not find a passage to the next round. In Group 4 both England and France qualified. Kuwait, having drawn against Czechoslovakia, lost heavily to the French, who for the only time in the first round showed the form that would take them to the semi-finals. The game was marred when Prince Fahed, the president of the Kuwaiti FA, who years later was killed defending his country against the invasion by Iraq, came onto the pitch to protest about a French goal. The referee then extraordinarily reversed his decision! Fahed not only had the money to hire the best coaches in the world but also, it seems, was a very persuasive man!

The hosts struggled to qualify for the next round from Group 5. Only a dubious penalty saved them from defeat at the hands of Honduras with whom they drew 1-1. Honduras were unlucky not to qualify. They also drew with Northern Ireland, and although they lost to Yugoslavia, it was only courtesy of a goal three minutes from time. Northern Ireland went into the last game needing a victory or a high-scoring draw against the Spaniards, who had beaten Yugoslavia 2-1 with the help of another penalty. Again the hosts looked overwhelmed by the pressure and their defeat at the hands of the Irish meant that they qualified for the second round but went into a much harder group containing both England and West Germany. The defeat also dispelled any notions the Spanish public might have had that their team could win the Cup.

Group 6 was the best of the first round. Brazil were back on song, playing lovely open football. After 12 years of living in the shadow of Pele, they had found their self-belief again. Based in the southern city of Seville, Socrates, Junior, Falcao, Eder, Zico and co put on a marvellous show, scoring 10 goals in their three games, and became the favourites for the title. Scotland, for the third tournament running, missed out on qualification on goal difference, but if their performance in Argentina had been inept, they could salvage some pride this time from their excellent contribution to a fascinating group.

The second round was left with four groups of unequal strength. Group C was especially strong, containing as it did the holders, the favourites and the ultimate winners. Both Brazil and Italy beat Argentina, who despite having Maradona in their side could not match the achievements of four years before. This left a decider between Brazil and Italy in the final game of the group. The match was a classic, and it saw the re-emergence of the man who was to win Italy the Cup, Paolo Rossi. Reprieved from a ban imposed after a match-fixing and bribery scandal, he suddenly burst into life in the game, scoring a hat-trick.

Brazil would rue the fact that, needing only a draw to qualify, they went out to win the game with the scores level at 2-2. Had they played more defensively after they levelled the scores they might not have let Rossi in for the winner 15 minutes from time. Out they went, but despite not winning the tournament they certainly made the biggest impression.

The other strong group on paper contained West Germany, the hosts and England. Spain bowed out after their defeat by Germany who had already drawn a sterile game with the English. England therefore had to beat Spain by two clear goals in the Bernabeu, but Spain, with the pressure off, were determined not to be humiliated and they defended admirably. England, who had come close on a number of occasions, went out. They had conceded just one goal and remained unbeaten, a record the West Germans could not match, but it was they who were in the semi-finals.

In Group D France began to play to the best of their ability. With a powerhouse midfield of Platini, Ghengini, Giresse and Tigana they outplayed both Austria and the Northern Irish to set up a semi-final meeting with West Germany.

The first semi-final saw Italy meet Poland. The latter had qualified due to the fact that they had beaten Belgium by more goals than the Soviets, but they were without Boniek for the semi-finals and it told. Playing before a half-full Nou Camp in Barcelona, Paolo Rossi was again the difference, scoring both the goals that saw Italy through to their second final in twelve years.

The France-West Germany match, held before a full house in Seville, was a much better game altogether, and vindicated the return to the use of semi-finals instead of group winners meeting in the final. The game saw the French at their very best, and the Germans at their most tenacious. The French, playing the fluent, outstanding football that made them European Champions two years later, quickly equalised a first-half Littbarski goal, and for the rest of normal time the score did not change. A crucial incident occurred in the second half which was ultimately to turn the game. Minutes after coming on as a substitute, Patrick Battiston, the French defender, was wickedly felled by Schumacher in the German goal. The Frenchman was carried off unconscious. West Germany were awarded a goal kick.

After scoring two goals early in extra time, France looked set for their first major final appearance, but in a show of Gallic extravagance they went forward in search of more goals. Had Battiston been on the field to shore up a weary defence this might not have mattered, but the Germans brought on Karl-Heinz Rummenigge and at his instigation they pulled level. For the first time in the World Cup, penalties were used to decide a game, a most unsatisfactory way of deciding the finalists for a competition of such importance. Unfortunately for France, after five kicks each and with the scores at 4-4, Schumacher saved from Bossis and Hrubesch scored the winner.

West Germany were without doubt the most unpopular finalists ever. They had lost to Algeria, been accused of a flagrant act of gamesmanship, and had now beaten the team most neutrals wanted to win, on penalties. Before the final Poland and France were involved in that most rare of events, an entertaining third place play-off. The French gave the rest of their squad an outing and lost 3-2 in the process, but for Poland third place capped a remarkable ten-year spell in world football which had seen them crowned Olympic Champions in 1972 and runners-up in 1976, achieve third place in the 1974 World Cup and reach the second round in 1978.

There are few better sights in football than a full Bernabeu stadium lit up against the night sky, and as Italy lifted the World Cup at the end of the final they knew they had graced the grand setting with some equally lovely football. The Germans were simply outclassed, although when Antonio Cabrini missed a first-half penalty many Italians must have thought it was not to be their day. After all, West Germany had progressed thus far against all the odds.

Once again it was Paolo Rossi who turned Italian domination into a goal, diving to head home a Gentile cross ten minutes into the second half. Tardelli had been quick to see Gentile free on the wing at a free kick and given him the ball before the Germans had time to react. Unusually for the Germans, their heads sank and Italy took over. Tardelli scored their second ten minutes later, after Rossi and Scirea had played a one-two in the area, and substitute Altobelli made sure of victory nine minutes from the end, Conti having run almost the full length of the pitch to cross it to him.

Breitner scored a consolation goal for West Germany right at the death, thus becoming only the third man after Vava and Pele to score in two finals. Italy, having played some dreadfully dour football in the first round, had suddenly sprung to life in the second and played attractive and entertaining football. For once they forgot about defence and concentrated on attack, and it won them the World Cup.

THE 13TH WORLD CUP
2ND MAY 1984 - 29TH JUNE 1986

The common pattern for the World Cup had been to alternate it between Europe and South America, and the 1986 tournament looked set to follow that pattern when Colombia were chosen as hosts. But in 1982, four years before the event, a combination of events forced them to withdraw, not least the fact that when they were awarded the tournament it was to comprise only 16 teams. Even with that number, a poor economic situation, as well as the violence associated with the drug trade, meant that it was not possible for them to go ahead and stage the event.

Brazil, the United States and Mexico all applied for the right to stage the tournament, and somewhat surprisingly Mexico emerged as the victors, becoming the first country to stage the tournament twice. A terrible earthquake in Mexico City a year before the finals nearly caused a second relocation but the tournament went ahead as planned. The problems with heat, altitude and an ever-worsening pollution problem, especially in the large sprawling capital, did not make conditions ideal, but like the 1970 tournament the 1986 World Cup was a success, despite these problems.

A record 121 countries entered initially, although after withdrawals only 113 nations set out on a qualification road that contained relatively few surprises. In Europe, Portugal qualified for only the second time and made a piece of history into the bargain when they inflicted on West Germany their first and only defeat to date in the World Cup qualifying tournament, with a 1-0 victory in Stuttgart.

All of the other major European powers qualified, although Holland, who would be crowned European Champions two years later, saw their revival cut short by Belgium in a play-off. There were few surprises in South America either as the 'big three' all made it to the finals for the first time since 1974. They were joined by Paraguay who made their first appearance since 1958.

North Africa provided both of the representatives for that continent as both Algeria and Morocco qualified. Such was the supremacy of that part of Africa that all five nations north of the Sahara made it to the quarter-finals of the qualifying competition and only Egypt missed out on the semi-finals.

The Asian qualifying group was divided into East and West which ensured that both the Middle East with Iraq and the Far East with South Korea were represented in Mexico. As by far and away the most powerful nation in the region, South Korea finally qualified for the first time since 1954 after so many near misses. Iraq's qualification was all the more remarkable in that all of their matches were played away from home due to the war with Iran.

CONCACAF were only given one berth in the finals due to the fact that Mexico as hosts qualified automatically, and it was to general surprise that the previously unknown Canadians won through at the expense of the supposedly superior Costa Rica and Honduras. With the demise of the North American Soccer League in the early 1980s, it had seemed as though football in that part of the world was on the decline.

The final tournament opened with a game between Italy and Bulgaria in the magnificent Azteca Stadium in Mexico City, the scene of the 1970 final. From the outset, the finals were regarded as the most open since they were last held in Mexico. There were no clear favourites. Mexico were not expected to win, despite a fanatical home following. West Germany, France, England, Italy and the Soviet Union were seen as potential winners from Europe whilst Brazil and Argentina were tipped from South America. If there were favourites, it was Argentina who took the fancy, largely due to the presence of Maradona who was at the peak of his career and playing football unrivalled since Pele had graced the World Cup 16 years previously.

Argentina duly won Group A, drawing 1-1 with the Italians in the big game of the group. The Italians, however, were at times given the run-around by South Korea in their final match. Fearful of another defeat by a Korean team, remembering their 1966 humiliation at the hands of the North, they eventually won 3-2. The new format of playing knock-out games from the second round meant that four of the third-placed teams with the best records in the six groups would qualify to make the numbers up to a workable 16. Italy's win over South Korea meant that the extremely dour Bulgarians qualified from Group A instead of the entertaining if somewhat cynical Koreans.

The effect of this format change was double-edged. Few doubted that knock-out games were potentially more exciting than group matches, but to achieve 16 second round qualifiers meant playing 36 first round games to eliminate just eight teams. The increase in the number of knock-out games also increased the spectre of the penalty shoot-out, as teams played for a draw in the hope of winning on spot-kicks.

Group B also saw three teams qualifying for the second round as Asia's other representatives, Iraq, were knocked out after playing some very sterile football. Mexico, playing to capacity crowds in the Azteca, were good value for their first place in the group. Inspired by their Real Madrid striker Hugo Sanchez, they beat ultimate semi-finalists Belgium 2-1 in their opening match after which qualification was virtually assured.

Group C saw the Soviet Union and France both finishing on five points, but having beaten Hungary 6-0 in their opening game the Soviets had a much better goal difference. Despite beating the weak Canadians 2-0, Hungary were disappointing after having initially been seen as a possible dark horse, and they were one of the two third-placed sides who failed to qualify. They deserve some credit, however. In their six games in the 1982 and 1986 finals, 29 goals had been scored in total. In an era when goals were beginning to dry up drastically, this was an achievement of sorts.

The third-placed team in Group D also failed to qualify for the second round as both Northern Ireland and Algeria were outclassed by Spain and Brazil in the most uneven first round group. Four years is a long time in football, and neither could live up to the reputations built in Spain in 1982. Northern Ireland's defeat by Brazil did have one event of note, however. Pat Jennings, the Irish goalkeeper, won his 119th and last cap, making him then the most capped player in history.

Called the 'group of death' by journalists, Group E was the hardest of the first round. All four teams were capable of qualifying and it was Scotland who were the unlucky team when for the fourth time running they failed to reached the second round. Denmark were in devastating form, winning all three of their games including a 6-1 annihilation of Uruguay, after which they were widely tipped as potential winners.

The last of the groups was by contrast called the 'group of sleep'. Based in the faraway and low-lying Monterrey, the first four games produced just two goals. Despite beating England in their opening game, Portugal were surprisingly eliminated when the group suddenly sprang into life with the final two fixtures. England recovered from a torpid start to the tournament when Gary Lineker scored three first-half goals in Monterrey against the mesmerised Poles to ensure England progressed to the second round when it had seemed likely that they would be returning home in disgrace. Even greater events were unfolding in Guadalajara where Morocco made sure of finishing top of the group with a stunning 3-1 victory over the hapless Portuguese. Thus for the first time an African nation had qualified for the second round. Nobody could now deny the growing strength of that continent.

The second round got underway in the Azteca when Mexico took on the Bulgarians. Looking for their first win in 16 games in the finals, Bulgaria were never in danger of breaking that most dubious of records, and they feebly succumbed to a spectacular overhead kick by Negrete and a header from Servin.

Later that afternoon the public of León were treated to an absolute thriller in what was undoubtedly the game of the tournament. With the score at 2-2 after full time, Belgium eventually beat the Soviet Union 4-3 after extra-time having twice been behind. Igor Belanov, later to be voted European Footballer of the Year, scored a hat-trick for the Soviets, but it was not enough and one of the best and most entertaining sides in the tournament bowed out of the competition.

The following day it was the turn of the South Americans to hold centre stage, and after having been thrashed by England, Poland were on the receiving end of another big score. Try as he might, Boniek could not inspire his teammates to the same form which had seen them finish third in Spain. Instead, Brazil with Alemao, Junior, Zico and the irrepressible Socrates in midfield and the excellent Muller and Careca in attack, easily swept aside the Polish challenge to win 4-0.

If Brazil were beginning to look like champions, Argentina increased the prospect of an all-South American final by overcoming a potentially difficult tie against their neighbours and fierce rivals Uruguay, in a repeat of the 1930 final. This was also the first time the two teams had met in the World Cup since then, and in difficult conditions Argentina gained some semblance of revenge for the defeat in 1930 when Pasculli scored the winner for them just before half-time.

World Champions Italy faced European Champions France in the Olympic Stadium in the next match of the tournament. For Italy, gone was Rossi and much of their inspiration, and they meekly lost to the French, for whom Platini was still the driving force in a team with which it was hard to find much fault. Giresse, Tigana and Fernandez were brilliant alongside Platini in midfield, whilst Battiston, Amoros and Bossis were firm in defence. If there was a weakness it was in attack, where Jean-Pierre Papin was still a rising star and unable to command a regular place.

France would ultimately lose again in the semi-finals to West Germany, who scraped through the second round against Morocco courtesy of a last-minute winner from a Matthäus free-kick. The Germans were looking as unconvincing as they had done in 1982 yet they seemed to get the results. Morocco returned home to a heroes' welcome, and had they not been a little too much in awe of the Germans they might well have progressed further.

The last day of the second round saw England take on Paraguay and Spain play Belgium. In a near-capacity Azteca, England carried on where they had left off against Poland. Lineker, this time with two goals, was the star of the show as the English staked their claim to be seen as serious title contenders. Both Hoddle and Beardsley were in fine form and the latter scored the other England goal to take their total to six in two games after having failed to score in their first two.

The real surprise of the round was Denmark's defeat at the hands of Spain in Queretaro. Defeat in itself was not so surprising - the Spanish had, after all, beaten the Danes in the semi-finals of the European Championships two years previously - but the manner in which Denmark fell apart after having taken the lead after half an hour was extraordinary. Emilio Butragueño scored four goals in the space of 46 minutes as Spain walked away with the match 5-1 before the bewildered Danes.

The unsatisfactory side of the knock-out tournament reared its ugly head in the quarter-finals when three of the four ties were settled on penalties, whilst the fourth was settled by an incident that will forever live in World Cup folklore.

In a good game between France and Brazil in Guadalajara, where as in 1970 Brazil were based, France reached their second successive semi-final. The game was not without incident. Muller had given the South Americans an early lead but Platini equalised just before half-time. In the second half, Zico, the hero of Brazilian football, temporarily became a villain when he missed a penalty after having just come on as a substitute and Brazil's chance had gone.

Carlos, their goalkeeper, was lucky to stay on the field after a wild challenge outside the area on Bellone just before the finish. The French striker had managed to stay on his feet but was off balance and could not make the advantage the referee had played count. French nerves at the prospect of losing a second penalty shoot-out were calmed after Socrates missed from Brazil's first effort and they eventually won 4-3.

West Germany and Mexico played out a sterile draw in the match later on in the day. After 120 minutes of no goals, it may have been something of a relief for the crowd to see the ball hit the back of the net even if it was from penalties. In 1970, Mexico had lost at home to Italy in the quarter-finals. They were to go no further this time either. Playing in Monterrey and not in the Azteca, the Mexicans' game suffered and even in the penalty shoot-out they could only score once. The Germans could hardly believe their luck. Once again they were in the semi-finals and no one could quite understand how.

The third quarter-final, played the following day, was potentially the most explosive, involving as it did England and Argentina. Four years previously the two countries had fought a war over the Falkland Islands and emotions were still running high. In the event it will be remembered as one of the most controversial matches in World Cup history. The football rivalry between the two countries had always been intense, no more so than in the 1966 World Cup when controversy surrounded England's victory in the quarter-final of that tournament. In that match, the sending-off of Rattin, the Argentine captain, had been a crucial factor. Maradona, the captain in 1986, was also to be a key figure.

His first goal early in the second half has become known as 'The Hand of God' goal, which is how Maradona described it after the match. As he went for a high ball in the area with Peter Shilton, the England goalkeeper, Maradona cleared fisted the ball into the net, but despite vehement protests from Shilton, the Tunisian referee would not change his mind and the goal stood. Four minutes later the English, still smarting at the goal, were two down. This time it was Maradona at his most brilliant. Collecting the ball in his own half he simply strode through a mesmerised English defence to score one of the best goals football, let alone the World Cup, has ever seen. Lineker scored a consolation for England to make him the top scorer in the tournament, but the Argentines won through and the English somewhat unluckily bowed out of a tournament they could have won.

The last quarter-final saw Belgium reach the semi-finals for the first time in their history as once again the World Cup jinx hit Spain. The Spaniards came closer to reaching their first semi-final than they had ever done before but were denied 5-4 on penalties. Butragueño and Michel were the stars of the side but they had to thank Señor for equalising a first-half Begium goal just five minutes from time. Not so fortunate was Eloy, whose miss proved vital in the shoot-out.

The France-West Germany semi-final was a repeat of 1982 and again the Germans triumphed, although this time they did not need penalties to reach the final. It also failed to live up to the pedigree of the 1982 match as France performed strangely below par, never recovering from conceding an eighth-minute Brehme free-kick. Only in the final stages of the game did the French really threaten the German goal, and it was not surprising that with a minute left Völler scored a vital second goal on the breakaway.

In the other semi-final, Maradona was again turning on the magic, but this time without any of the controversy. As in the quarter-final with England, he scored his two goals early in the second half, the second of which was almost as good as his outstanding effort against the English. The Belgians, no doubt delighted to have proceeded so far, knew they had been beaten by a far superior team. Argentina, meanwhile, knew that they were overwhelming favourites to win their second world title, and win it they did.

Having lost the third place play-off in Spain, France made no mistake this time, beating Belgium 4-2 in Puebla, but once again the value of the fixture was brought into question as the French used it to give a run out to those players who had not featured heavily in the other matches.

Throughout the tournament, Franz Beckenbauer, the West German coach, had been saying his team was not good enough to win it. They had reached the final thanks largely to the 'tournament mentality' so prevalent in German sportsmen. They also undoubtedly had some fine players. Karl-Heinz Rummenigge was again the inspiration, but alongside him were players of the calibre of Lothar Matthäus and Felix Magath in midfield, Andreas Brehme, Thomas Berthold and Karl-Heinz Förster in defence, and Klaus Allofs and Rudi Völler in attack.

Argentina were obviously reliant on Maradona for much of their inspiration, but they were by no means a one-man team. In midfield, Sergio Batista, Ricardo Giusti, Hector Enrique and Jorge Burruchaga were all in excellent form, whilst Oscar Ruggeri was proving to be one of the best defenders Argentina had ever had. Alongside Maradona in attack, Jorge Valdano was also at the top of his game.

In a packed Azteca with the majority of the crowd behind Argentina, a slightly nervous performance by both sides in the first half saw Brown, the Argentine defender, give his side the lead after 22 minutes with a header from a Burruchaga free-kick. Ten minutes into the second half, Argentina were 2-0 up when Valdano, put clean through by Enrique, coolly slotted the ball past Schumacher. The Argentines were coasting to victory, but the Germans rose to the occasion and gave them a nasty shock.

With 17 minutes left the Germans pulled a goal back from a corner when Rummenigge prodded the ball home after it had been headed down by Völler, and from an almost identical situation eight minutes later it was Völler himself who sensationally levelled the scores, heading home after Berthold had played on a Brehme corner. It was anybody's game, but Maradona was not going to let his hour of glory slip away. With an exquisite pass he found Burruchaga in acres of space, and the Argentine midfielder had no trouble in finishing off a glorious move to seal the title for the South Americans.

Though he had not managed to score in the final, there was no doubt who the man of the tournament had been, and as he went up to collect the trophy, Maradona knew he had inherited Pele's title of the world's best footballer. Argentina had played the most consistent football throughout the tournament and had won all but one of their matches. Their manager Carlos Bilardo had built a side that complemented Maradona well and they fully deserved their victory. If there had been some lingering doubts about their victory eight years previously on home soil, few begrudged them their triumph in Mexico.

THE 14TH WORLD CUP

17TH APRIL 1988 - 8TH JULY 1990

For the first time since 1950, the number of countries taking part in the World Cup fell, perhaps in anticipation of the poor tournament that was to result at the end of the qualifying matches. Italia '90 will be remembered for dull, defensive football, and ultimately proved a test not of footballing prowess but of penalty-taking technique. Italy were awarded the tournament in 1984 during the FIFA congress at the Los Angeles Olympic Games. Their only competition was from the Soviet Union whose case was shot to pieces by their boycott of those very Games.

Italy therefore became the second nation to be awarded the tournament twice. They promised a host of new facilities, and although it looked like a close call at times, with a number of building workers being killed in the process, the tournament started as planned with 10 refurbished stadiums and two totally new ones, in Bari and Turin.

The qualifying tournament produced a couple of surprises, the major one being the elimination of France. Coached by the star of their three previous World Cup campaigns, Michel Platini, they were busy restructuring their team and came third in their group behind Yugoslavia and Scotland. The rest of the European zone went much to form. Of the countries who finished in second place in the three groups containing four sides, Denmark were the unfortunate ones to miss out on Italy as only the two with the best records, England and West Germany, qualified. Like France the Danes were a team in transition but the finals would have undoubtedly benefited from their flair.

Making their first appearance in the finals were the Republic of Ireland. Following on from their success in qualifying for the European Championships two years previously, they inherited the mantle left by their neighbours in the North whom they eliminated. They also made sure Hungary were not present for the first time since 1974, and also missing were Portugal and Bulgaria both of whom had been finalists four years previously.

South America saw no surprises, but a huge scandal instead. In one of the most outrageous pieces of cheating ever seen, Chile left the field in the final and crucial group match with Brazil when they were losing 1-0 and on their way out of the competition. The reason for their departure was a flare thrown from the crowd at Rojas, their goalkeeper, and they claimed to fear for their safety. At first sight it looked as though he was badly injured as his team-mates carried him off, but it soon transpired that the flare had not hit him and that the bleeding conveniently visible to the television cameras was self-inflicted.

For their rather ridiculous efforts, the perpetrators of this pre-arranged plan were given lengthy bans and Chile were barred from the 1994 tournament. Banned from the 1990 tournament were Mexico, for cheating in the World Youth Cup by fielding over-age players. This left the CONCACAF field wide open and for the first time ever Costa Rica made it to the finals. Traditionally the second power in the region behind Mexico, it was surprising that it had taken them so long to qualify, but they did so with ease. That was not the case with the United States, who accompanied them to Italy. A 1-0 victory in Port of Spain meant that they and not the colourful Trinidadians qualified, much to the relief of FIFA who had just awarded America the staging of the 1994 tournament.

Asia was once again represented by South Korea, who won a tournament staged in Singapore for the six first round group winners. They were expected to be joined by either China or Saudi Arabia, two growing continental powers. Instead it was the tiny oil-rich United Arab Emirates who joined the Koreans in Italy. It seems remarkable that a country with a population of under two million could humble a country like China with over 500 times the population, but the Emirates showed the benefits that good organisation and a few petro-dollars can bring.

The number of teams taking part from Africa was at its lowest level since 1970. Undoubtedly the difficult economic situation on the continent affected the entry, but there was also continued resentment at the allocation of just two places, and some of the smaller nations, with little chance of qualifying, decided not to enter or pulled out at a later date. Having generally been run on a knock-out basis, the competition now saw group matches used in the first round, from which four teams emerged.

Once again North Africa was strongly represented, with three of the four teams. Egypt qualified for the first time since 1934 at the expense of Algeria who were attempting to make it three final tournaments in a row, but it was the other qualifiers, Cameroon, who were to make all the headlines in Italy. By beating Tunisia 3-0 on aggregate, they made their second appearance in the finals and once there, were minutes away from becoming the first African nation to reach the semi-finals. Their performance in Italy had one major benefit for the rest of African football in that FIFA found it hard to resist the African demands for an extra finals place which they were duly awarded for the 1994 tournament.

The build up for the finals in Italy promised much more than the tournament delivered. The Italian league had the majority of the top players in the world playing there and the shackles of catenaccio were slowly but surely being thrown off. The hosts were capable of playing some excellent football and with home advantage they were overwhelming favourites to win the tournament.

The 1986 champions, Argentina, were also regarded as likely challengers before the tournament started, but after the opening game, staged in the beautifully revamped Giuseppe Meazza Stadium in Milan, they were regarded in an entirely different light. The champions were humbled by Cameroon, despite the Africans having two men sent off. Francois Oman Biyik scored the only goal of the game five minutes after his brother, Kana Biyik, had been sent off. Roared on by the crowd, Cameroon held on to their lead and scored one of the most sensational victories the World Cup had ever seen.

Cameroon followed up this victory with another one in their second game, against Romania. The hero of that performance was the 38-year-old Roger Milla who came on as a substitute with 15 minutes remaining and scored two goals to qualify his side for the next round. The surprise failures of Group B were the Soviet Union who were strongly fancied at the start of the tournament. They showed their potential by beating Cameroon 4-0 in a final game that ultimately had no bearing on the outcome of the group. Romania finished second and Argentina qualified as one of the four best third-placed teams.

Group A was very clear cut. Italy won all three of their games in fine style and were joined by Czechoslovakia in the next round. Both Austria and the United States had miserable World Cups. Austria were expected to do much better; the same could not be said about the United States. Alarmingly for FIFA, interest in the tournament back home in America was limited to the numerous ethnic communities who usually followed the fortunes of other teams, most notably the Irish. The one consolation for the Americans was a fine goal scored by Caligiuri against Czechoslovakia which many rated as one of the best of the tournament.

Brazil were easy winners of Group C even if their coach Lazaroni did come in for much criticism for adopting too 'European' an approach. What was surprising in the group was that Costa Rica finished second and eliminated both Scotland and Sweden, both of whom they defeated in some style. With much of the attention focused on Cameroon, the achievements of Costa Rica have largely been forgotten. Scotland were eliminated in the first round for the fifth consecutive tournament.

Three teams qualified from Group D which was won by West Germany, who looked in very good form. Having demolished both Yugoslavia and the United Arab Emirates, they let their form slip against the Colombians, whose presence in the tournament had provoked a huge operation by America's Drug Enforcement Agency. At times it seemed as though they ought not to look any further than the Colombian goalkeeper, Rene Higuita, so strange were some of his antics. The majority of the crowds loved him for his cavalier attitude, though he did have his critics.

This was not Asia's tournament. The Emirates were obviously outclassed in Group D, whilst in Group E, South Korea could not rekindle the spirit that had seen them perform well four years previously in Mexico. The group was won by Spain who were hoping to win on Italian soil just as the Italians had won on Spanish soil in 1982. The side had matured well since reaching the quarter-finals in Mexico and they had little trouble in beating both Belgium and the Koreans and drawing with Uruguay, who won through to the next round in third place courtesy of a last-minute winner against South Korea.

The most closely fought group in the first round was Group F containing England, Holland, the Republic of Ireland and Egypt, the outcome of which was in doubt right to the very end. Five of the six games were drawn, the only exception being England's victory over Egypt in the final match. This result meant that England won the group and Egypt were eliminated. Lots had to be drawn to decide the placings of Holland and Ireland and it was kind to the Irish who were pitted against Romania in the next round instead of West Germany.

Much of the football in the first round had been predictable, and if not exactly boring, it had lacked the passion to bring the tournament to life. In every match apart from Costa Rica's 2-1 win over Sweden, the side who scored first either went on to win or at least draw the game. Much more criticism was to follow in the rest of the tournament, particularly in relation to the use of penalties to decide drawn games.

It looked as if the opening game of the second round would be decided in just that way when after 90 minutes and one period of extra-time, both Colombia and Cameroon had failed to muster a goal. Just as in the game against Romania in the first round, however, it was to be Roger Milla's day as again he scored two goals after having come on as a substitute. The second of these goals was in no small part down to Higuita who was robbed of the ball way outside of his penalty area. Although Redin scored for the Colombians just before the end, the Cameroons went one further than Morocco in 1986 and became the first African nation to reach the quarter-finals.

Later the same night another side from the Americas was dumped out of the tournament when the Czechs beat Costa Rica 4-1 in Bari. The Costa Ricans were not disgraced. Trailing 2-1 with 15 minutes to go they let Czechoslovakia in twice as they pushed forward for an equaliser.

The South American agony continued the following day in Turin and it was the turn of Brazil to exit the tournament at the hands of their fierce rivals Argentina. Despite dominating most of the match and coming close on several occasions, they were beaten by a Caniggia goal after a clever through pass by Maradona, his only really noteworthy contribution to the tournament. Once again the Brazilians had failed, and the result only served to enhance the perception that the Brazilians were a fading world power. They might have won the tournament on three occasions, but with each successive World Cup it seemed these victories were being consigned further into the annals of soccer history.

The best match of the second round was between Holland and West Germany in Milan. The Germans faced potentially their biggest threat in the form of the European Champions. Six of the players on the pitch plied their trade in that very stadium in Milan: Brehme, Klinsmann and Matthäus of West Germany with Inter, the Dutch trio of Gullit, Rijkaard and Van Basten for Milan.

The Dutch had been rather subdued in the first round, but the game burst into life after 20 minutes when both Rijkaard and Völler were sent off after a bad-tempered exchange. The incident gave the match a cutting edge that most of the other games in the tournament lacked, and in a pulsating second half Klinsmann and Brehme scored to give the Germans victory. Ronald Koeman's reply for Holland came too late.

There was no such excitement the following day in Genoa, except for the penalty shoot-out in which the Irish knocked out Romania. Neither side managed to score in 120 minutes of open play but were remarkably efficient at the spot kicks. Only Timofte failed to convert his, but that was enough to see Ireland through to the quarter-finals, even though in the four games they had played they had failed to win at all and had only scored two goals in the process.

Italy's progress to the quarter-finals had been far more confident and assured and against Uruguay in the Stadio Olimpico in Rome they chalked up another comfortable win. Their new hero, Salvatore Schillaci, scored their first midway through the second half and Serena made sure of the game just before the end. The Italians were the only quarter-finalists to have won all of their games and they had not conceded a goal either. In the quarter-finals they were pitted against the Irish whose record could not have been more different.

The final day of the second round saw Yugoslavia take on Spain in Verona and England play Belgium in Bologna. Spain yet again failed to live up to their promise and were beaten by the ever-improving Yugoslavs, thanks in no small part to some excellent finishing by Dragan Stojkovic. His two goals were the decisive factor in a close-fought tie that went to extra-time.

Extra-time was also needed in Bologna and it was not until the very last minute, when David Platt coolly finished off a Paul Gascoigne free-kick, that the two sides could be separated. Belgium, inspired by the brilliant Enzo Scifo and the ageless Ceulemans and Gerets, came close on a couple of occasions, but they were not to repeat their success of four year previously and England qualified to meet the Cameroons in the next round.

The first three quarter-finals produced just two goals between them. In one of the worst games of the tournament, Argentina and Yugoslavia played out a tedious 0-0 draw in Florence which was only enlivened by the penalty-kicks at the end. Sergio Goycochea, who was Pumpido's replacement in goal after the first-choice keeper had broken his leg in the match against the Soviet Union, was Argentina's hero as they triumphed 3-2 after both sides had at one point been ahead.

Argentina were to come in for great criticism on their route to the final. They rarely offered any positive football and seemed content to take their chances on post-match penalties. In 1986, though Maradona played a crucial role, he was only one of a very good team. In Italy, the Argentinians seemed to abdicate all responsibility to him, and as he was not one hundred per cent fit the team suffered as a result.

Italy took on the Republic of Ireland later on in the day in Rome and again Schillaci was the telling factor, although the Irish put up their best performance in defeat. Italy's victory was hardly surprising. They looked threatening whenever they attacked and should have scored more goals. It was the end of the road for the Irish whose fans had made the most of their first World Cup appearance and certainly added much colour to the occasion.

The following day in Milan, the West Germans moved relentlessly into the semi-finals even if it did take a somewhat dubious penalty for them to do so. Despite their fine football some of the Germans' antics were beginning to raise questions about their excessive will to win. A disturbing feature of the tournament had been the number of times referees were prompted into giving decisions that resulted from play-acting by the players, and unfortunately the Germans were more guilty than most. The Czechs, who had played good football throughout the tournament, could have won the game had they made their early pressure count, but in the end, with two goal-line clearances by Hasek and Bilek, they were fortunate to lose only 1-0.

The last quarter-final between England and Cameroon in Naples was by far the best game of the tournament. Cameroon came within ten minutes of a semi-final place and only lack of experience told against them. The match was unique in Italia '90 in that it was the only time that the lead in a game changed hands twice. England went ahead through a David Platt header midway through the first half, only for Cameroon to equalise after fifteen minutes of the second half with a Kunde penalty after Roger Milla was felled in the area.

Both sides were playing fluent, open football and it was no surprise when Milla and Ekeke combined well for the latter to put the Africans ahead four minutes later, but the drama was not over yet. Cameroon appeared to be coping well with containing England in the last 25 minutes, but nine minutes from the end they gave away a silly penalty which Gary Lineker converted. England had been given a considerable fright coming so close to elimination, but they made sure of qualifying for their first semi-final since 1966 when Lineker was again brought down in the area and converted his second penalty in extra-time. Cameroon had without question been one of the highlights of the tournament and in Roger Milla certainly had the star of the show.

The semi-finals were surrounded with controversy as both finalists were decided on penalty kicks. In Naples, Argentina knocked the hosts and favourites out after a 1-1 draw. Italy went into the lead after 17 minutes when Schillaci scored his fifth goal of the series. It seemed as though they would cruise through the game, but Argentina were forced to take the game to the Italians who inexcusably tried to sit back on their lead.

Had they attacked with more enterprise they might well have won with ease but instead Walter Zenga in the Italian goal was forced to pick the ball out of his own net for the first time in the tournament when midway through the second half Caniggia headed home an Olarticoechea cross. Neither side thereafter seemed to have enough imagination to win the game in open play and the Argentinians, thanks once more to the skill of Goycochea in goal, won the ensuing shoot-out. It was a desperately unsatisfactory end to Italy's campaign.

Turin was the location for the second of the semi-finals the following day. England and West Germany took to the field in the new Stadio Delle Alpi and served up an excellent game. Like the previous evening, however, it ended 1-1, and the Germans qualified for their third successive final, the second time they had done so courtesy of penalty kicks. Like the England-Cameroon match, the game was open and flowing and full of incident. England were much on top, but against the run of play the Germans took the lead on the hour when a Brehme free-kick was deflected over Shilton by Parker's attempted block.

Again England left it late and with only ten minutes remaining, Lineker, who had had a quiet first round in the tournament, was again on hand to rescue his side with a well-taken goal from a Parker cross. Both sides hit the post in extra-time but no further goals were scored. In the penalties that followed, West Germany scored all four of theirs with clinical precision, but first Stuart Pearce and then England's best player in the tournament, Chris Waddle, missed their kicks and England were out.

To have both semi-finals decided on penalties was totally unsatisfactory in such an important tournament, and since then the whole concept of penalties has been brought into question. Many regard them as responsible for dull and tedious football, as weaker teams pack their defences in the knowledge that even if they don't score, as long as the other side does not either they still have a fighting chance of winning the match. It is perhaps no coincidence that in the earlier years of the World Cup, draws were less frequent in the knock-out stages because there was no such escape clause. In 40 later-stage games between 1954 and 1970, not one single match was drawn!

If the final had been decided on a penalty shoot-out, it would not have been inappropriate. Instead it was decided by a penalty in normal time, and the Germans won the world's highest honour having scored just one goal from open play in their final three games, and that came from a set piece. The final itself was a disgrace and both sides were equally responsible. Argentina clearly played for penalties whilst the Germans indulged in gamesmanship that saw two of their opponents sent off.

It was also the first final that saw less than three goals scored. Without fail, finals in the past had always lived up to their billing as the showpiece of world football. The best teams had not necessarily always reached the final nor won, but they had all been entertaining affairs. The third-place match between Italy and England might well have produced a much better final. Certainly, in the later stages, the matches those teams had been involved in were amongst the best in the tournament, and the third-place match itself was a most engaging game, even if the pressure was off.

West Germany were expected to win with ease. Lothar Matthäus was at the peak of his game, whilst Maradona was a mere shadow of his former self. Only seven players remained from when the two teams had met in the final four years previously but both coaches were the same. Beckenbauer was out to become the first man to captain and coach a winning side whilst Carlos Bilardo was determined to follow in the footsteps of Vittorio Pozzo and become only the second coach to retain the title.

Few expected it to be a good game and sure enough the world had to witness 90 minutes of the most uninspiring football imaginable. The only goal came five minutes from the end, much to the relief of the crowd who were spared another 30 minutes' tedium. Völler was brought down in the penalty area and Brehme's kick won the game for Germany. Ten minutes previously, however, Calderon had been brought down in the German area in a not dissimilar incident, but Argentine appeals went unnoticed by the Mexican referee.

If Argentina thought they had been hard done by in that incident, their feelings towards the referee weren't improved by the two sendings-off which reduced them to nine men by the end. After 68 minutes, Klinsmann's over-exaggerated dive when tackled by Monzon got the Argentine sent off for his troubles, whilst with three minutes to go Dezotti was dismissed after trying to retrieve the ball from Köhler, who refused to let go. On their performance throughout the tournament, a West Germany win was far more preferable than an Argentinian one, but the 1990 final left a bad taste in the mouth.

THE 15TH WORLD CUP
21ST MARCH 1992 - 17TH JULY 1994

The fifteenth World Cup had it all. From very unpromising beginnings, with the award of the tournament to the United States, through an eventful qualifying competition which saw the elimination of some big names, to a final tournament full of excitement, USA '94 ranks among the very best.

The football played showed a renaissance of the ideals which had made Mexico in 1970 such an historic tournament. Fear of defeat was on the whole replaced by a desire to play creative football. No-one, perhaps, reached the heights of the 1970 Brazilians, but overall, in a far more technical game, skill and the enjoyment of playing flourished, where it had been subdued in Italy four years previously.

It was fitting, therefore, that it should be Brazil again who ultimately emerged victorious. They may have lacked the flair of their famous predecessors but coach Carlos Alberto Parreira, not to be confused with the captain of the 1970 side, knew exactly what he wanted from his team and there can be little doubt that not only did they contribute hugely to the excitement of the tournament, but that they were the best side present.

For years FIFA had been anxious to see football take off in America, the potential for fuelling their ever-increasing coffers not lost on the men from Zürich. The United States it was, therefore, who got the vote ahead of Morocco at the FIFA congress in Berne in 1988, the date of the announcement strategically switched to 4th July to coincide with American Independence Day. There were many dissenting voices. Morocco were furious that their bid had been turned down, claiming, justifiably, that decisions were being made according to financial and not sporting criteria, and that the award of the tournament to an African country would help the growth of the game there. But FIFA were unmoved.

If the final tournament turned out to be a classic, the qualifying tournament was no less full of incident. It kicked off in Santo Domingo in March 1992 with a match between the Dominican Republic and Puerto Rico, but was soon marred by one of the greatest tragedies ever to befall the World Cup.

On the night of 27 April 1993, a Zambian military plane crashed off the coast of Gabon. On board were eighteen members of the Zambian national side on their way to a match in Senegal. All of them were killed. Battling on with a side of inexperienced players led by Kalusha Bwalya, who was not on the plane, Zambia came within one point of qualifying for America. Needing only a draw in their final match away to Morocco, they lost, alas, 1-0.

Morocco's victory ensured their third appearance in the finals, and they were joined by the heroes of Italia '90, Cameroon, who qualified despite a strong push from Zambia's neighbours Zimbabwe. Another nation from the south of the continent made an emotional return to the world football, after an absence of twenty-eight years, following their suspension and eventual expulsion from FIFA. South Africa had the misfortune, however, to be grouped in the first round with Nigeria, and in their first ever World Cup match, in Lagos in October 1992, they lost 4-0. Nigeria, after years of being on the verge of qualifying, finally did so, beating Algeria and the Côte d'Ivoire in the second round to make up the trio of African nations at USA '94.

Without the presence of the United States, who qualified automatically as hosts, CONCACAF were given only one automatic berth in the finals. Mexico, having been banned from Italia '90, had little trouble in claiming it. A second spot was up for grabs in a three continent play-off and so the CONCACAF runners-up, Canada, faced Australia, who had won the Oceania tournament. The Australians won this tie on penalties and with it the right to play the runners-up in South America's group 1 for a place in the finals.

This turned out to be Argentina, but only after an extraordinary South American qualifying tournament which saw a number of upsets. The Argentinians suffered one of the most humiliating experiences in their 93-year international history when they lost their final match 5-0 at home to Colombia, their worst defeat ever. The Colombians won the group easily, but Argentina came perilously close to not qualifying at all. Had Paraguay managed to beat Peru, the worst of all the South American nations in the qualifiers, in their final game, they and not Argentina would have faced Australia over two legs for a place in the finals. As it was, Argentina made heavy weather of the play-off, a single goal in Buenos Aires sending them through.

In group two, there was sensation also. On 25 July 1993, Brazil suffered their first ever defeat in a World Cup qualifier when they went down 2-0 to Bolivia in La Paz. A 6-0 victory in the return ensured that Brazil would not be missing out on the finals for the first time, but it was Bolivia who accompanied them at the expense of Uruguay. A 3-1 victory, again in La Paz, proved to be the difference.

Asia was no less interesting, and at one stage threatened alarming possibilities for the American organisers. After an initial first round which featured one of the worst performances in World Cup history – Macao lost all six games, conceding an amazing 46 goals – there remained a final group of six teams which included Iran, Iraq and North Korea, none of whom were on the best of terms politically with the United States. To the relief of all at USA '94 headquarters it was the much more compatible Saudi Arabia and South Korea who qualified.

In the end the challenge to the eventual qualifiers came not from the United States' three bêtes noires but from Japan. Indeed, the Japanese were within seconds of qualifying, but in the final seconds of the last match of the group they conceded a goal to Iraq which gifted their place in the finals to South Korea.

With the award of an extra place to Africa, European nations were competing for only twelve places instead of thirteen. This made the European zone extremely competitive. Group 3 contained no less than four recent finalists in Spain, Denmark and the two Irelands. In the end it was the European champions Denmark who were the major casualties, a second-half goal by Spain in the last, crucial, match of the group knocking them out. The Spanish were accompanied to the finals by the Republic of Ireland, finalists for the second successive tournament.

Two other major footballing powers failed to qualify. England started as favourites to qualify along with Holland from group 2, but no-one had reckoned with Norway who started off with a 10-0 win over San Marino, the first time a European side had managed to score ten in a World Cup qualifier since 1969. With their confidence high, the Scandinavians followed up with victories over both Holland and England at home and ensured their qualification by drawing the away legs. This left a decider between the Dutch and English in Rotterdam to see who joined them. In a dramatic and controversial match, Holland won 2-0. England were out and, having feared the worst from the notorious English hooligans, the American organisers breathed another huge sigh of relief.

Just as dramatic was the exit of France from the tournament. Needing just one point from their last two games, the French looked to be coasting, especially as both games were at home against Israel and Bulgaria. In the first of those games the French were 2-1 up with only seven minutes to go but incredibly lost 3-2, Israel's first ever victory in a competitive match on European soil. Then against Bulgaria, the score stood at 1-1 in injury-time when Kostadinov broke away and scored a stunning goal to win the game and put the French out. It was small consolation that the group winners Sweden and Bulgaria finished third and fourth respectively in the final tournament.

Elsewhere the drama was harder to find. The Italians had a fright when they were held at home by Switzerland and then lost the return in Berne, but they muddled their way through, a late goal by Dino Baggio against Portugal ensuring that they qualified. The Swiss, one of the surprises of the qualifying tournament, secured their first appearance in the finals since 1966.

Group 4 in Europe was one of the closest with 3 points separating the top four sides. Belgium won their first six games, then faltered, but had done enough to see off the challenge of Czechoslovakia and Wales and qualify along with Romania. For Czechoslovakia it was the end of a World Cup story stretching back sixty years, two World Cup finals in 1934 and 1962 the highlights of a distinguished career in the tournament. The final game played by the team was a 0-0 draw in Belgium, before the Czechs and Slovaks went their separate ways.

Political changes in Eastern Europe seriously disrupted group five. The break-up of the old Soviet Union into independent countries, after the draw for the tournament had been made, caused a bitter dispute as to who should inherit the single place in the group. When it was decided that Russia should do so there was fury in the Ukraine, which had always been a huge source for players in the Soviet side. A compromise was reached whereby Ukrainians would be allowed to play for Russia in this tournament, but could represent Ukraine in future tournaments.

The situation was further complicated by the presence of Yugoslavia in the group. Sanctions against Belgrade meant that they were banned from international competition, with the result that there were only five teams in a weak group. It was only ever a two-horse race, and although Iceland put up a spirited performance, their best ever, they were no match for Greece and Russia. Greece made the finals for the first time in their history, but both qualifiers from group 5 failed to make it past the first round in America.

The Americans had six years to prepare for the finals and crucially no new stadia were needed. The Rose Bowl in Pasadena was chosen for the final, and with a capacity of over 90,000, it was the largest of the venues selected. The Pontiac Silverdome near Detroit was an interesting choice given that it provided the setting for the first World Cup match to be played indoors.

It was Soldier Field in Chicago, however, which hosted the opening ceremony. By American standards it was a rather subdued affair, as was the inaugural game between Germany and Bolivia, though it did show the first evidence of FIFA's strict instructions to referees to get tough on rule-breaking. The Bolivian Marco Etcheverry became the first of fifteen players to be sent off in the tournament. Much controversy would surround FIFA's efforts to clean up the game but they did lead to a reduction in bad tackles and, with the spectator in mind, time-wasting.

Jürgen Klinsmann scored the only goal of the game, and the Germans qualified for the second round with relative ease, though they were given a nasty shock by the South Koreans in their last game; 3-2 was the final score but it could have been worse for the Germans. The Koreans were undefeated until that point. They had staged a magnificent recovery against Spain in their opening game, scoring twice in the last ten minutes to force a 2-2 draw, but unfortunately could do no more than draw 0-0 against the hapless Bolivians. It was a key result. Spain beat Bolivia in their last game and finished in second place. Two points was not enough for Korea to qualify in third place.

There was no third qualifier either from group B, where Russia and Cameroon went home after the first round. In contrast to Italia '90, America was not a happy hunting ground for the Lions of Cameroon. Players were justifiably upset at unpaid bonuses and at one point before the tournament started FIFA were on the verge of awarding their place to another country after a dispute amongst officials following an election in the Cameroon Football Federation.

Russia too were racked by internal disputes which left them without such players as Shalimov, Kiriakov and Kanchelskis. If there was one consolation, it was in the 6-1 victory over Cameroon in their last game, and the setting of a new World Cup record. Oleg Salenko scored five goals, the first player ever to score more than four in a game in the finals. He also finished the tournament as joint top-scorer. Another record was set in the game when Roger Milla at 42 broke his own record as the oldest player to score in a final tournament.

The group winners were Brazil, ahead of Sweden. The Swedes had drawn their opening match with Cameroon, but victory over Russia meant that they had as good as qualified before they met Brazil in their final game. Brazil for their part were the pre-tournament favourites and they started their campaign with the belief that they really could win the cup for the first time since 1970. The problem lay in finding a balance between a style of play that was pleasing to watch and one which was capable of winning the tournament. As they cruised through the first round it looked as if they might have cracked the problem.

As for the host country, the USA, they finished third in one of the most exciting groups of the first round and along the way gave a massive boost to football in America by defeating one of the pre-tournament favourites to win the World Cup, Colombia. The South Americans turned out to be the biggest disappointment of the whole tournament as it all went disastrously wrong for them against Romania (1-3) and the USA (0-2). The latter result showed a sceptical American public that their side were no fools, but at the same time it dumped the Colombians out of the competition.

It also had far more serious consequences for one player in particular. Andres Escobar had scored an own goal in the first half to put the USA 1-0 ahead and after he returned home he was gunned down outside a restaurant in his home town of Medellin. His assassin is alleged to have shouted, "That's for the own goal." The murder cast a shadow over the tournament. Many of the Colombian team refused to fly back home and stayed on in America. They did win their final game, against Switzerland, but by then it was too late. The group was won by Romania, and with Georghe Hagi in inspirational form they were the major revelation of USA '94.

The other major talking point of the first round centred around Argentina and the possible return of Diego Maradona. He declared himself fit, and Argentine coach Alfio Basile was convinced enough to gamble on playing him. At first it seemed to have paid off; against Greece in their opening match, Argentina and Maradona were magnificent. He gave a display which ranked among his finest ever and capped it by scoring a delightful goal. Suddenly the Argentines looked potential champions. Boosted by the return from suspension of Claudio Caniggia and the emergence of Redondo as a world-class player, they beat Nigeria with another fine display. Then their world fell apart as Maradona failed a drugs test after the match.

As FIFA's medical expert put it, Maradona had used a 'cocktail' of ephedrine-based drugs in his campaign to get fit again. Maradona was withdrawn from the Argentine squad before he could be banned by FIFA, and although he admitted to using ephedrine-based drugs, he stated he did not realise they were a banned substance and claimed that he was a victim of a FIFA campaign to disgrace him. Certainly suspicion surrounded the fact that he should have been chosen randomly after the Nigerian game for the dope test, but whatever the circumstances, he had tested positive and had to go.

Having lit up the tournament in their first two games, Argentina now stumbled badly and were beaten 2-0 by Bulgaria. It was one of the most fascinating groups of the tournament. Having failed in sixteen attempts to win a game in the World Cup finals, the Bulgarians made it seventeen when they lost their opening game 3-0 to Nigeria, the newly-crowned African champions showing flair, skill and tactical awareness. The Bulgarians did bounce back in their next game, however, finally winning a match at the eighteenth attempt. Unsurprising perhaps that it should be against the hapless Greeks, the worst team in the tournament by some distance, but it was followed up by their second win on the trot against Argentina. With Nigeria also beating Greece, all three teams finished on six points, and by virtue of a stunning last-minute goal from Amokachi, Nigeria topped the group.

Ultimately it proved to be a misfortune for them because in the second round they faced Italy, who had scraped through group E in third place. The Italians had a torrid time in their first round matches. In one of the most eagerly anticipated games of the whole tournament they faced Ireland in the opening match of the group in New York, a centre of huge Irish and Italian immigration in the early years of the century. A 1-0 victory for Ireland sealed their reputation as great battlers, but for Italy it was a poor start that would colour the rest of their performances in the tournament.

The group was by far and away the worst of the first round. Goals were in short supply and if any team did emerge with credit it was Mexico, the eventual winners of the group. But it was a close-run thing. All four teams finished on four points and it was the defensive-minded Norwegians who failed to qualify for the next round. If there was some encouragement for Italy it was their brave performance against the Scandinavians. Down to ten men after their goalkeeper Pagliuca had been sent off, they managed to pull off a 1-0 win.

Group 6, seen as a straightforward affair for Holland and Belgium, did not prove to be so simple. Once again the Dutch preparations were hampered by the resurgence of that old chestnut, player power. Ruud Gullit stormed out of the training camp, refusing to travel to the States with the team, and with Marco Van Basten injured, Holland looked short of players capable of winning the World Cup. In their opening game, against Saudi Arabia, they were given a nasty shock before grabbing a late winner.

Belgium had just as much trouble overcoming supposedly weaker opposition in their first game against Morocco, but they managed to win 1-0 and repeated the scoreline in their next match against the Dutch. In the most sensational result of the group, however, the Belgians lost their final game to one of the most stunning goals the World Cup has ever seen, Saeed Owairan running three-quarters of the length of the pitch to score. Having already beaten the unlucky Moroccans, Saudi became the first Asian side since North Korea in 1966 to qualify from their group.

The last-minute goals in group D meant that the composition of the second round changed dramatically at the last moment. All four of the major nations, Argentina, Italy, Germany and Brazil would be kept apart until the semi-finals – if they qualified.

Germany and Belgium kicked off the second round at Soldier Field and set the tempo for much of the remaining knock-out games as three goals were scored in the first eleven minutes. Rudi Völler, recalled to the side after Stefan Effenberg had been sent home, made an immediate impact, opening the scoring after five minutes then setting up Klinsmann for Germany's second. By half-time the Germans were 3-1 up and cruising, but their poor second-half performances were a feature of the tournament and they were lucky to emerge victorious in this encounter. Albert pulled a last-minute goal back, but in a crucial incident earlier in the half, the Belgian striker Weber had been pulled down in the penalty area. The Swiss referee Röthlisberger did not award a penalty, a decision for which he was later sent home by FIFA.

Later in the day at RFK Stadium in Washington, Switzerland were victims of another controversial refereeing decision in their match against Spain. If a player is not interfering with play he should not be given off-side, the new FIFA directive said, as part of their attempts to give the benefit of doubt to the attackers. Hierro's opening goal for Spain saw the perfect interpretation of this. When he broke through, a team-mate was well off-side, but the goal stood. The match ended in a 3-0 victory for the Spaniards, but the scoreline did not do justice to the Swiss, who had surpassed all expectations.

Dallas was the venue the following day as Sweden took on Saudi Arabia. An early goal put the Swedes comfortably in command in the first half, and early in the second they increased their lead. The Saudis, however, slowly took control and by the end Sweden were on the rack. When Al Ghashiyan scored a superb individual goal four minutes from time, they looked certain to equalise, but in their efforts to score they conceded a third. Saudi had arrived in the States as complete unknowns, but they left with their reputation, and that of Asian football, considerably enhanced.

Later that afternoon, 90,000 fans in the Rose Bowl, Pasadena, were treated to the best match of the whole tournament, a thriller between Romania and Argentina. Once again the goals came early. A Dumitrescu free-kick opened the scoring for Romania, and although Batistuta scored from a penalty five minutes later, within two minutes the Romanians were back in front as Hagi set up Ilie Dumitrescu who finished exquisitely. Hagi scored the third himself with a magnificent shot but the excitement was not finished. With fifteen minutes to go Argentina, who had dominated the match and fallen to the counter-attack, got the second goal their pressure deserved through Balbo, but despite coming close on several occasions, they could not level the scores and were out. Despite all of the trauma surrounding Maradona, they had won a host of admirers.

Independence Day saw the match that all America had been waiting for – the USA against Brazil – but first Ireland faced Holland in the heat of Orlando. The Dutch had won group F without ever having played well, but against the Irish they asserted their undoubted superiority, winning 2-0. It was the end of an Irish adventure that began to turn rather sour after their win against Italy. Defeat against Mexico, a tedious draw against Norway, and numerous problems with FIFA officials on the sidelines had taken the shine off their initial success. Against Holland they rarely threatened and the second goal was the result of a dreadful error by the usually excellent Packy Bonner in goal.

Stanford Stadium in San Francisco was the setting for the biggest game in the history of American soccer. For most of it the United States held the Brazilians at bay, and when just before half-time Leonardo was sent off for elbowing Ramos in the face, it seemed as though the impossible fairytale might just come true. With ten men, however, the Brazilians looked no less dangerous and fifteen minutes from time Bebeto scored the winner. That the Americans lost was no disgrace. They had averted the organisers' worst nightmare by qualifying from the first round, and the match against Brazil was watched by record television audiences.

The final day of the second round kicked off at Foxboro Stadium in Boston with a dramatic match as Nigeria came within a minute of eliminating Italy. A goal midway through the first half by Amunike put the Africans ahead and for the rest of the match, staunchly defending their goal, they kept the Italians at bay. Indeed, when Maldini pulled down Yekini with the Nigerian clean through, Italy were lucky not to be reduced to nine men, having already had Zola sent off moments before. But luck was certainly with the Italians in USA '94 and Roberto Baggio scored a last-gasp equaliser with a perfectly placed shot. Buoyed by this let-off, the Italians won the game with a penalty in extra-time.

There were criticisms of the standard of refereeing during the game, but they were nothing compared to those levelled against Al Sharif, the Syrian official in charge of the last game of the second round between Mexico and Bulgaria. By the end it had been turned into a farce. Stoichkov gave Bulgaria the lead with a brilliantly taken goal early on, but the Mexicans pulled level through a dubious penalty. The game was never bad-tempered and there were few serious fouls, but the referee was handing out so many cautions that inevitably in the second half two players were sent off for second offences. Not surprisingly the game petered out well before the end, and so for the first time in the tournament penalties were needed to decide a game. Penalty shoot-outs are not the Mexicans' strong point and yet again they failed to score more than one. Bulgaria qualified to meet Germany in the quarter-finals.

The schedule for the quarter-finals did not afford the Italians much rest. Their tie with Spain was the first played, and once again they got through a match they scarcely deserved to win thanks to Roberto Baggio. Throughout the tournament his overall contribution was negligible, yet his goals were magnificent, the angles so precise. Against the Spanish he scored another beauty with only two minutes remaining. Spain felt mightily aggrieved that they were not given a penalty just before the end when Tassotti viciously elbowed Luis Enrique in the face. The Spaniard had his nose broken and Tassotti later received an eight-match ban from FIFA, but Italy were in the semi-finals.

Brazil and Holland contested the second quarter-final at the Cotton Bowl in Dallas, and after a dreadful first 45 minutes, the game came alive. Having gone 2-0 ahead early in the second half, the Brazilians had their lead wiped out and might have crumbled, but they hit back through Branco's unstoppable free-kick from an outrageous distance. There had been a suspicion of off-side about Brazil's first two goals, but they survived their sternest test in the whole of the tournament to qualify for their first semi-final appearance since 1970.

The notable aspect of the quarter-final line-up was that seven of the eight teams were from Europe, and two of these were Eastern European nations. After so many World Cup embarrassments in the past, Bulgaria had now won three games on the trot but no-one gave them much chance against Germany. They responded by playing the game of their lives, as a brilliant Stoichkov free-kick and a superb Letchkov header sent the Germans home early. It was the first time they had lost at the quarter-final stage since 1962.

The last quarter-final was the second game to be decided on penalties, and it was the ebullient Romanians who lost out to Sweden in San Francisco. Before the game bets were being placed on an all-Eastern European final, but it was not to be. Raducioiu scored a last-gasp equaliser for Romania to send the game into extra-time and both sides scored again to make the final result 2-2. Ravelli in Sweden's goal was the hero in the shoot-out, saving from Belodedici.

It had been one of the most open tournaments in the history of the World Cup, but the semi-finals saw the end of the upsets. At Giants Stadium, Italy faced Bulgaria in what turned out to be an undistinguished match, apart, that is, from twenty minutes in the first half when the Italians ran their opponents ragged in an exhibition of football that was perhaps the best seen in the whole tournament. Roberto Baggio, inevitably, scored two superb goals in the space of five minutes to secure the win for Italy, but once Stoichkov scored from the penalty spot just before half time, the Italians went back into their defensive shell. They held on to reach the final for the fifth time in their history.

The second semi-final, a repeat of the 1958 final between Brazil and Sweden, was a disappointment. Exorbitant ticket prices meant that there were gaps in the Rose Bowl crowd and the match as a result seemed muted. The Brazilians again left it very late before scoring the only goal of the game, courtesy of Romario ten minutes from the end. The defensive Swedes looked intimidated by Brazil and gave up without much of a fight.

In the final Brazil could not manage to break down the Italian defence although Mazinho, Bebeto and Romario all came close. Baresi and Maldini both had fine games for Italy, but Baggio, suffering from a hamstring injury picked up in the semi-final, was never more than a passenger up front. His effort when clean through just before the end of extra-time was symptomatic of Italy's performance, as he shot weakly and hopelessly off target. In a tournament whose overall message was that positive football could win the day, it was ironic that the final should be goalless (the first ever) and have to be decided on penalties. It was Baggio, his touch deserting him after his goals had kept his side in the tournament, who missed the penalty which won the cup for Brazil.

It was a desperately unsatisfactory way in which to decide the world champions, but it did not detract from the overall impression the tournament had made. USA '94 will rank amongst the best ever staged, along with Mexico '70, Argentina '78 and Mexico '86. FIFA will be hoping that the standards set in the States will be built upon in France in 1998.

THE FOOTBALL TOURNAMENT OF THE OLYMPIC GAMES

The football tournament of the Olympic Games has proved to be a major headache for the International Olympic Committee (IOC). There has been much argument about its status in the Games throughout the years because football is a sport dominated by professionalism while the tournament was, until recently, open only to amateur players.

There have been several distinct phases in its history: from 1896-1904 it was little more than a demonstration sport; from 1908-28 it could legitimately be regarded as the world championship; from 1952-76 it was the domain of the eastern European state amateurs; and post-1980 it was opened up to professional players who had not competed in World Cup games. The 1992 tournament in Barcelona heralded a further new phase. Olympic officials had wanted to turn it into a tournament open to everyone but, fearful that this would threaten the pre-eminence of the World Cup, FIFA insisted that it should become instead the official Under-23 world championship.

6th - 15th April

Baron Pierre de Coubertin, the French educationalist, was the man mainly responsible for the revival of the Olympic Games. The first record of them being held was in 776 BC – although they certainly date from before then – and they continued through to AD 393 when they were abolished by the Christian Roman emperor Theodosius I, Greece having fallen under the influence of Rome. It is said he objected to the pagan rituals which accompanied the event. The Athens games of 1896 signalled a return after some 1503 years absence. De Coubertin believed strongly in the ideals of amateur sportsmanship and was of the opinion that the games would help promote peace among athletes and nations.

The first games of the modern era, the 294th in all on record, were staged at Athens in a new arena, the Panathenaic Stadium, built for the occasion and containing room for 80,000 people. As would be the case with future celebrations, the main heroes came from the athletics events held in the stadium. Sadly there was no such excitement surrounding the football competition. Quite where it was staged is unknown, as are the scores of all but one match – Denmark beating an Izmir select XI 15-0. The results involving the Athens select XI have been lost over the years. Denmark was credited with just one gold medal at the games and it was not for the football.

II. OLYMPIAD, PARIS 1900

20th May - 28th October

The 1900 Olympic Games in Paris were a disaster. Held on a haphazard basis from May until the end of October to coincide with the World Exhibition being held in the same city, they passed off almost unnoticed. Once again football was not considered as anything but a demonstration sport, despite the great progress being made in the game's organisation on the continent at the time. Three teams entered: a French XI, a Belgian XI and, representing Great Britain, Upton Park FC of London.

Upton Park were a moderately well-known side who had won the inaugural London Senior Cup in 1883 (and again the following year) and the Essex Senior Cup in 1895. With football in Great Britain still light years ahead of its rivals on the continent, they met the winners of a play-off in which the French beat Belgium 6-2 and duly became, somewhat dubiously, champions of the world. Olympic gold did not do much for the club, which folded not long afterwards.

Upton Park's victory was very much in keeping with the tempo of the rest of the Games. It is said that many competitors in Paris were unaware that they were actually taking part in the Olympics. "We have made a hash of it," were De Coubertin's words – and that was before the Games had even begun. Five months later no-one was disputing his verdict.

III. OLYMPIAD, ST LOUIS 1904

1st July - 23rd November

Like the 1900 edition, the 1904 Olympic Games were also held in conjunction with a World Trade Fair - The Louisiana Purchase Exhibition - this time in St Louis in the United States, although they had initially been awarded to Chicago. And like the Paris Games, they were a disaster that nearly killed off the Olympic movement. St Louis was not a good choice; its remoteness from Europe meant only 13 nations bothered to enter, the number of athletes taking part fell from 1330 to 625, and of these 533 were Americans. Quite how seriously the whole event was taken was shown when it transpired that the winner of the marathon had taken a 10-mile lift in a car!

Competition was held over a period of five months with the football tournament taking place at the end, in November. There is some dispute as to whether it should be listed as an official or demonstration sport, but either way it consisted of just five matches involving three teams, all of them from North America. Played on a league basis, the tournament was won by Galt FC of Ontario representing Canada, ahead of Christian Brothers College, St Louis representing USA (I) and St Rose Kickers, St Louis representing USA (II). The next time the Olympics came to America in 1932, there would not even be a football tournament.

INTERIM GAMES, ATHENS 1906

22nd April - 2nd May

The intercalated Olympic Games of 1906 were a curious affair. The Greeks had hoped to hold their own games every four years to alternate with the main event, and 1906 was the first date this had been possible. But de Coubertin opposed the idea, it was dropped for future years, and none of the events are listed as official. At least after the disasters of 1900 and 1904 these Athens games of 1906 helped to revive the Olympic spirit.

The football tournament consisted of the same three teams as in 1896 plus a select XI from Salonica, only this time the team playing under the banner of Izmir was an international one, consisting mainly of French and Englishmen. Again the Danes won, beating both Izmir and Athens in the process. More is known about this Danish team; three of its members appeared two years later in the London Games.

IV. OLYMPIAD, LONDON 1908

1st Football tournament, 19th - 24th October

The 1908 Games helped launch the Olympics as a major occasion, as big crowds turned up to the new White City stadium in London to watch the events. They also marked the birth of the official football tournament, helped no doubt by the fact that the Games took place in the home of football. Held after the track & field had finished, it was won by the England amateur team, representing the United Kingdom. Containing many of the country's best players, the side could lay claim to being the first world champions, even if the entry was restricted to just five countries.

Political troubles had led Hungary and Bohemia to withdraw, which left just two first round games. England's biggest rivals were Denmark, and it was they who stole the show. While England easily dispatched Sweden by eleven clear goals, the Danes beat a French "B" team 9-0 and were in exhilarating form against the French "A" team in the next round. Sophus Nielsen scored 10 goals as Denmark recorded the biggest ever win in international football to date, 17-1.

Their performance in the final against England, who had beaten Holland 4-0 in the other semi-final, was very creditable. The Danes were roundly praised as they lost only by two goals, and some reports described them as unfortunate to have lost at all. On half a dozen occasions in the second half, only good keeping by Bailey or wild Danish finishing kept England in the match.

The England captain, Vivian Woodward, scored the goal that clinched the game for his side. One of the most famous players of the day, he was England's leading goalscorer until he was overtaken in the 1950s by Lofthouse and Finney. If one includes the goals he scored in the amateur side, he can be regarded as the most prolific Englishman ever.

V. OLYMPIAD, STOCKHOLM 1912

The 2nd Football tournament, 29th June - 4th July

The newly built Stockholms Stadion provided the centrepiece to the 1912 Games, including a football tournament played in sweltering heat, although some games were held at the Råsunda. The English amateur side, again captained by Woodward, retained their title, this time beating Denmark more comfortably in the final. The entry more than doubled to eleven as the tournament established itself as one of the main attractions of the Games. Finland, Italy, Austria, Germany, Hungary, Norway and Russia entered for the first time.

The 1912 tournament saw the start of a practice subsequently followed at most pre-Second World War games: having a consolation tournament for the teams beaten early on so that they did not have to travel home having played only one game. It was during this event that the German Gottfried Fuchs equalled Sophus Nielsen's feat of scoring 10 goals in a match as his side equalled the greatest margin of victory in an international. On the receiving end of the 16-0 thrashing were the Russians, who did not reappear until the 1952 Helsinki Games.

In the preliminary round of the tournament proper there were two surprises, the elimination of the hosts by Holland and of the Italians by Finland. Having lost to the Dutch in the previous Olympics Sweden had hoped that home advantage would tell this time, but Holland along with Denmark were the most developed of the European nations and were on their way to a second successive bronze medal. Finland's victory was all the more surprising because the game against Italy was only their third ever international match, the previous two having been lost heavily to Sweden. Austria, altogether more advanced than their German neighbours, won the third of the preliminary round fixtures, but in their first round tie they faced the Dutch for the first time ever in international football and lost 3-1.

Finland disposed of the very weak Russians in their first round tie, while England easily overcame Hungary 7-0, a score which the Danes repeated over Norway. The semi-finals therefore pitted the Finns against England and Denmark against the Dutch. There was little doubt as to what the result of the first tie would be, but the match between Denmark and Holland pitted the best two continental sides against each other. The Danes were the acknowledged masters of the continent, however, and it was they who prevailed on the day, Emil Jorgensen, Poul Nielsen and Anthon Olsen scoring the goals.

So once again the final was between England and Denmark. Anthon Olsen pitched in with two more goals but England, through Berry, Walden and Hoare, scored four. The result was not a foregone conclusion, as two years previously the Danes had become the first non-British side to beat an England international XI, beating the same amateur team that they were facing in the final, 2-1 in Copenhagen. Two years later they would win 3-0 in Copenhagen but here they lost to the English to take silver again. England were perhaps fortunate that Buchwald of Denmark had to leave the game injured, as they capitalised on the advantage to score two quick goals and eventually won 4-2.

Unlike the team of four years previously when all but three were full internationals, only Knight, Berry, Woodward and Walden played for the full England side during their careers, whilst Denmark included Chelsea's Nils Middleboe. Woodward and Berry became double Olympic gold medallists. Only eight other footballers can boast such a feat, Dezso Novák of Hungary and seven Uruguayans: Andres Mazzali, José Nasazzi, Pedro Arispe, José Andrade, Santos Urdinaran, Hector Scarone, Pedro Petrone and Pedro Cea.

The tournament was on occasion very rough, especially in the final of the consolation event between Austria and Hungary. In contrast, the England–Finland semi-final was notable for the pleasant atmosphere, which extended to an act of sportsmanship unlikely today. Awarded a penalty, England thought this "altogether too severe a punishment", and the ball was ostentatiously put over the bar!

VI. OLYMPIAD, BERLIN 1916

Cancelled

VII. OLYMPIAD, ANTWERP 1920

3rd Football tournament, 28th August - 5th September

The ravages of the Great European War meant the cancellation of the 1916 Games due to be held in Berlin, but in keeping with the four-year cycle they resumed once again in Antwerp in 1920. None of the defeated combatants - Germany, the Austro-Hungarian bloc and Turkey - were invited and the war still cast a shadow over the event. It was a very low-budget affair, yet still the organisers went bankrupt. Neither were the Games particularly memorable, although there was great controversy in the football tournament.

The centre for the Games, the Olympisch Stadion in the Kiel district of Antwerp – now known as the Kielstadion – was home to Beerschot, then one of the top teams in the Belgian league. A new main stand was built for the Games, but compared to the stadia built for 1908 and 1912 it was small beer, holding only 27,000 spectators. For the first time some of the matches in the football tournament were farmed out to other cities, including one of the quarter-final ties.

Many nations were making their international debuts in the football tournament, among them Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Spain, Egypt and Greece, while Luxembourg's game against Holland was only their fourth ever. There was controversy on a number of fronts, however. Great Britain were furious about the flagrant abuse of the amateur definition laid down for the tournament by FIFA and vowed never to take part in the tournament again. Indeed, by 1928 the differing definitions of the term amateur led to the four British Associations withdrawing from FIFA in protest.

Britain was not against professionalism, but insisted on clear-cut rules so that everyone knew where they stood. Central to the issue were "broken time" payments, that is to say payments made to compensate players for loss of income from their regular jobs whilst they were taking part in the tournament. FIFA insisted that players receiving such payments could be considered as amateur; more than forty years' experience of dealing with the problem at home convinced the British that this position was unworkable.

In the event Britain, again represented by the England amateur side, were knocked out by one of the few other genuine amateur teams present, Norway. Of the debutants only Czechoslovakia and Spain made it past the first round, the Czechs' 7-0 win over Yugoslavia signalling the start of an era which was to see great success at club level and an appearance in the final of the 1934 World Cup. Herbert "Murren" Karlsson was the hero of the round, scoring five of Sweden's nine goals in their thrashing of Greece.

A goal by Patricio, the first ever scored by Spain, put an end to the proud Olympic record of Denmark. Until the previous year they had been beaten on only two occasions by opposition other than the English amateurs in over 30 matches. Defeats away from home against Norway and Sweden in late 1919 and against Holland in Amsterdam four months before the Olympics were perhaps signs that their dominance was coming to an end, but they never expected to lose to the Spaniards. In the other first round ties a few eyebrows were raised at the difficulty Italy had in beating Egypt, but there were no such problems for Holland as they dispatched Luxembourg.

Another brace of goals from Karlsson could not rescue Sweden in the quarter-finals as they lost out by the odd goal in nine to the Dutch, who went on to meet Belgium in the semis. The host nation had received a bye in the first round and now dispatched Spain in the quarter-finals coutesy of a hat-trick from their star player Robert Coppée. Norway, who had provided the real surprise of the tournament with their first round victory over England, collapsed against Czechoslovakia, letting in four without reply, while France made it a second miserable tournament in a row for the Italians with their 3-1 victory. The result was something of a surprise given that the French had been beaten 9-4 earlier in the year in Milan.

In the semi-finals Belgium produced one of the best results in their history, beating Holland 3-0, their first victory over their neighbours for ten years, and the Czechs continued to make one of the most impressive international debuts ever witnessed. Drawing on the experience of players from the former republic of Bohemia and of great clubs like Sparta and Slavia Prague, they beat France 4-1 to make it 15 goals in three games with only one conceded. Antonin Janda-Ocko led the scoring with six goals, although it was a hat-trick by Oto Mazal-Skvajn which saw off the French.

The final was a truly bad-tempered affair that was never finished. Belgium won the match but it ended in uproar not long after the home side scored their second goal. The Czechs walked off the pitch complaining of biased refereeing by the English official. They were promptly banned by FIFA and a tournament for the silver and bronze medals was hastily arranged. Spain, having won the consolation tournament, beat Holland in a play-off to decide the medal placings, consigning the Dutch to their third consecutive bronze. Ideally the second and third place play-off should have involved Holland and France but most of the French players had gone home after their semi-final defeat. The Belgians' gold medal represents the only success by their national side in any tournament, and signalled a decline in the game in that country that was to last nearly 50 years.

VIII. OLYMPIAD, PARIS 1924

The 4th Football tournament, 25th May - 9th June

Paris was given a second chance to stage the Olympic Games and unsurprisingly expended much more effort on the occasion than Antwerp had done four years previously or indeed than they had done themselves 24 years previously. The stadium at Colombes, home of the famous Racing Club rugby side, was enlarged to hold all the major events including 10 of the football matches, but the French crowds were criticised for their partisan behaviour which went as far as booing during the national anthems.

Happily the football tournament will be remembered as one of the best ever, to rank alongside that of Amsterdam in 1928. The 1920s would chiefly be remembered for the dazzling skills of the South Americans, which many Europeans were seeing for the first time – remarkably, 1924 was the first time any South American team had played on European soil. Indeed the impression made by Uruguay in these Paris Games helped create the legend of skilful South American football that Brazil were to build on in later years. In a wonderful display that took the European sides by surprise, Uruguay won the tournament with ease, a feat they repeated four years later.

A definite aura surrounds the Urùguayan teams of 1924 and 1928, owing partly to the fact that most of the players went on to win the first World Cup in 1930. Their style was new to the Europeans. They played with a flair and a joy that had rarely been witnessed before and their sheer skill on the ball took the breath away. For such a small country Uruguay had an outstanding record in international football. In 1923 they were crowned South American champions for the fourth time in only eight tournaments, two ahead of both Argentina and Brazil. It was a title they were to retain on their return from Paris.

The entry for the tournament grew from 14 to 22, but due to the amateur divide Great Britain were not present and neither were Denmark, the two finalists from 1908 and 1912. The Football Association in London had asked FIFA in 1923 to accept its definition of the word amateur, but this was refused. In 1921 Belgium, the Olympic champions, had legitimised the payment of players for income lost due to football commitments. France, Italy, Norway and Switzerland soon followed suit, whilst still defining these players as amateur. FIFA had no clear definition and it was left to individual countries to decide on the issue.

This left the IOC with a tricky problem, but given that football was by far and away the biggest attraction, providing over one third of the total income, FIFA's wish to bow to the will of the majority and the IOC's wish to see football included in the Games were perhaps understandable. The football final alone in 1924 provided the Games with one-twelfth of the total income, money essential for their financial survival and well-being.

Because of the high number of entrants a preliminary round had to be played, pitting many of the weaker nations against stronger opponents. This was not the case, however, in the Italy–Spain encounter. Both were rightly counted among the pre-tournament favourites. Spain had won eight games in a row between September 1920 and January 1923 and drawn 0-0 draw in Milan in March 1924, but over the years the Italians were to prove a bogey team for them, beating them in this tournament and in the 1928 Olympics and the 1934 World Cup. Here the Spaniards lost 1-0, and to make matters worse, they won their next nine games after the Olympics before losing in May 1927 – to Italy! The Spanish record speaks for itself - 19 wins in their first 23 international matches.

Other preliminary round matches saw the Uruguayans thrash Yugoslavia 7-0, a repeat for the Yugoslavs of their defeat at the hands of Czechoslovakia four years earlier. Pedro Petrone scored the first two of his eight goals in the tournament for Uruguay. Both of the finalists from 1920 were beaten in the first round, Belgium rather heavily at the hands of Sweden, Czechoslovakia by Switzerland who went on to reach the final. Hungary, one of the major powers of the time, were on the end of the tournament's biggest upset losing 3-0 to Egypt.

The two American entrants met in the first round, Uruguay easily beating the USA. The Uruguayans had little trouble reaching the final, beating the hosts in the quarter-finals and in the semis consigning Holland to their fourth consecutive semi-final defeat. The Dutch could not make it four bronze medals out of four, however, as Sweden beat them in the play-off.

The final was a terribly one-sided affair. Although they had beaten three strong sides to reach the final, the Swiss were not a great force and there was nothing the star of their side, Max Abegglen, could do to stop the South American champions, who scored once in the first half through Petrone and twice in the second through Cea and Romano. Cea, Nasazzi, Andrade and Scarone were all members of the World Cup winning side six years later, and this victory signalled the beginning of Uruguay's 10-year reign as world champions.

IX. OLYMPIAD, AMSTERDAM 1928

The 5th Football tournament, 27th May - 13th June

For the third consecutive occasion the Olympics were staged in north-west Europe, the honour this time going to Amsterdam. The major innovation of the Games was the Olympic flame which has since come to symbolise the whole movement.

Setting the football tournament on fire again were the Uruguayans. This time they were joined by their South American rivals Argentina, who if anything were the more impressive of the two en route to the final. The Argentines scored 23 goals in their first three matches, Tarasconi getting ten of them with four each in the first two matches. The United States were overwhelmed in the first round and Belgium dispatched easily in the quarter-finals before Argentina met the real surprise of the tournament, Egypt, who had defeated Turkey and Portugal to reach the semi-finals. The Africans could progress no further as Argentina scored six more goals without reply.

The other half of the draw was certainly the stronger. Germany were back for the first time in 16 years but they were undone by Uruguay in the quarter-finals. In the semi-finals, the Uruguayans met Italy, who had been responsible for the demise of France and Spain and were many people's favourites for the title. In a close game the South Americans recorded their eighth straight win in Olympic competition to set up a classic encounter with their neighbours Argentina in the final, the first part of a double bill that would be resumed two years later in the World Cup final.

For the only time in the history of the competition the Olympic final was not settled in the first game and required a replay. The 1-1 draw in Amsterdam's Olympic stadium was the 102nd time the two teams had met. In the 103rd meeting the Argentines fell to the guile of Figueroa and Hector Scarone, the former playing his only game of the tournament. Against anyone else, Argentina would probably have become champions, but Uruguay knew them well and exploited that knowledge to the fullest.

The 1928 final was the last hurrah for football in the Olympic Games. Professionalism was rapidly spreading and by the time football was next held in the Games, in the Berlin Olympics of 1936, most of the major nations taking part could not send their full-strength squads. Indeed such were the problems this issue was causing that the 1932 Games in Los Angeles did not have a football tournament, the only Olympics not to do so.

POST-1928 OLYMPIC GAMES

After 1928 the Olympic football tournament gradually became an outdated concept for the nations of South America and Western Europe, and although they continued to enter teams, they had had no realistic chance of success against the state-sponsored amateur sides of post-war eastern Europe. Scandinavia, for so long a bastion of the amateur game, emerged as the only threat to the sides of the Communist bloc, none more so than Sweden, victors in 1948.

The 1952 tournament, the last not to be preceded by a qualifying round, was won by Hungary, and the Olympic title stands as the only major honour won by the Magic Magyars in their heyday. The side was almost identical to that which appeared in the 1954 World Cup final, but on no occasion after 1952 could the winners claim to be the best team in the world as the Hungarians could.

Yugoslavia won at the fourth attempt in 1960 in a tournament whose stucture was rapidly changing. The qualifying tournament for 1956 had involved only 10 games; for 1960 it was divided along continental lines and consisted of almost 100. Both Africa and Asia were given two entries each and in many respects the Olympic football tournament has been just as important to these countries as the World Cup, given the small number of professional players there.

In 1964 their allocation for the final tournament was increased to three entries each, compared to the World Cup, where they were allotted just one. It is not surprising to find that the Olympic tournament often attracted more entrants and became a regular feature on the fixture list for both continents.

The 1960s and 1970s were dominated by Hungary, Poland, Czechoslovakia and East Germany, who entered sides identical to those fielded in normal internationals, but for the 1984 tournament FIFA changed the eligibility rules to allow the selection of anyone who had not played in a World Cup qualifier. This was a bizarre rule at best, in that it actually stopped many amateurs from taking part in what was supposed to be an amateur tournament.

It did break the eastern European stranglehold, as France won the gold medal in Los Angeles, but it threw the tournament into disrepute. Had it not been for the huge crowds which attended matches at each Games, football might well have been jettisoned long before. At Los Angeles and Seoul for example, more spectators turned up to see the football than any other event, including track & field, and the revenue was important for the success of the Games as a whole.

The IOC tried to persuade FIFA to accept an Olympic tournament open to the full national sides of every country, but FIFA were not keen to see the status of the World Cup undermined and instead decided on an under-23 tournament open to all players, regardless of their professional status or past World Cup appearances. This was implemented for Barcelona in 1992.

The solution smacks of compromise, but at least the playing field is now level for all nations, for the first time since the 1920s. There are many who feel that with a gap of four years, the World Cup is not representative of the shifts in power among the top football nations, and that a full-strength Olympic Games football tournament would be a good idea. Accommodating the extra qualifying fixtures, however, might prove to be an insurmountable problem.

THE FIFA UNDER-17 WORLD CHAMPIONSHIP

Aside from the World Cup for men and women and the football tournament of the Olympic Games, FIFA organises the Under-17 World Championship and the World Youth Cup for Under-20s.

FIFA is very keen to promote football at the grass-roots level and although often criticised for bringing competitive football to players at too young an age, it feels that the two junior tournaments serve that ideal. Both are relatively new tournaments, and the under-17 championship has shown that levels of skill are relatively even around the world. Africa has won three of the five editions and Asia one.

It is after that age that the disparity begins to show and the fact that the under-20 Youth Cup has been won on each occasion by a European or South American country shows how the more stable club situation on those two continents helps the development of players, many of whom are already established in a first division team at that age.

A major problem with the under-17 event especially has been the question of over-age players, and despite the heavy punishments handed out by FIFA, most notably the suspension of Mexico from the senior World Cup in 1990, accusations still fly after each event.

THE WORLD CUP FOR WOMEN

The Women's World Cup, although only introduced in 1991, looks set to tap into one of the biggest growth sports in the world. It is not impossible that eventually the tournament will become an equal partner to the men's event as has happened in tennis and athletics.

Certainly, with half the world's population to account for, FIFA is taking the challenge seriously. If they can change football from being a bastion of male culture to a sport both played and watched by women as equal partners to men, it will be a magnificent achievement. It should certainly be one of their top priorities for the 21st century and the World Cup is just the first step on what promises to be a fruitful road.

INTERCONTINENTAL CHAMPIONSHIP

If the World Cups since 1982 have proved anything, it is that the national sides of Asia and Africa are no longer pushovers for the rest. Gone are the days of Yugoslavia putting nine goals past Zaire. In 1982 Algeria beat West Germany, the eventual finalists, 1986 saw Morocco win their group, the exploits of the Cameroon in 1990 are legendary, and in 1994 the Saudis gave Asian football a massive boost.

The introduction in 1992 of the Intercontinental Championship, the winners of the world's regional championships for national sides competing in a tournament for the King Fahd Cup, was therefore a logical step. The European champions were absent from the first tournament in 1992, and it was Argentina who won the inaugural title by beating the Asian champions – and hosts – Saudi Arabia in the final.

The tournament does, however, have two major weaknesses. The oil-rich state of Saudi Arabia puts up millions of dollars to stage the tournament, including lavish prize money for all the participants. In 1992 the Saudi team were Asian champions but by the time of the second edition in 1995 they had no claim to be there at all. The fact that they took part anyway somewhat devalued the event.

The second problem relates to the timing of the continental championships which qualify teams for the intercontinental event. South America, CONCACAF and Africa stage theirs every two years, Europe and Asia theirs every four. Thus the 1995 winners Denmark, for example, could have taken part in the first two editions on the strength of having won just one edition of the European Championship in 1992.

The event as a concept does look set to stay, though whether or not it remains in Saudi Arabia is less certain. The 1995 tournament was surprisingly poorly attended, with the magnificent King Fahd stadium in Riyadh never more than half full. Matters were not helped by a lacklustre performance from the Saudi side which otherwise had an excellent year. Their World Cup performances in the States had impressed, while four months later they won the Gulf Cup for the first time.

A full-strength Denmark side beat Argentina in the final, handing Daniel Passarella his first defeat as Argentine coach. Denmark had earlier looked to be on their way out of the tournament, trailing Mexico late in the game in the last match of group 1. A Rasmussen equaliser two minutes from time, however, meant that both finished with identical records. Technically, lots should have been drawn to decide who proceeded to the final, but seeing as both teams were on the pitch a penalty shoot-out was quickly arranged. Never strong at penalties, the Mexicans missed out, reviving memories of the 1986 and 1994 World Cups when spot-kicks had also been their downfall.

WORLD CLUB CHAMPIONSHIP

The World Club Championship is actually nothing of the sort as it involves only the winners of the European Champion Clubs' Cup and the Copa Libertadores. None of the African, Asian or CONCACAF champion teams are involved. Until this happens the title will remain a misnomer, despite the fact that in the event of a tournament involving all of the continents, a European or South American winner would be the most likely outcome.

A letter from Henri Delaunay, the general secretary of UEFA, to CONMEBOL suggesting a meeting between the winners of both the European Cup and any South American tournament they might organise was the spur the needed to get the Copa Libertadores off the ground.

At first the idea of an annual challenge match seemed a good one, but after a promising start the event became embroiled in controversy, and has only settled down as a worthwhile event since the fixture was move to Tokyo in 1980. Until that point games had been played on a home and away basis and more often than not resembled a battleground.

The tournament has gone through three distinct phases coinciding with the three decades of its existence. Real Madrid were unfortunately coming to the end of their supremacy when the tournament started but they appeared in the first edition and in a pulsating match in Madrid thrashed Peñarol 5–1. The following year Peñarol recovered their self-respect with a 5–0 victory over Benfica in the Centenario and a 2–1 win in the play-off two days later. Santos were responsible for another five-goal extravaganza against Benfica the following year, but the honeymoon was nearly over.

The 1963 Milan–Santos series was marred by several incidents and it became increasingly common for the intense rivalries between the two continents to spill over into violence on the field. There was no better example than in the 1967 and 1968 series, which involved Argentine and British clubs, and in 1969 when Milan played Estudiantes.

Feelings were running high in Argentina over their quarter-final exit in the 1966 World Cup against England, and in the play-off between Racing Club and Celtic a fight on the pitch led to five players being sent off after Basile had spat at Lennox. Manchester United and Estudiantes played a bad-tempered series the following year after which Stanley Rous, the president of FIFA, was moved to write a letter of complaint to the management of Estudiantes.

The whole justification of the tournament came into question the following year as Estudiantes embarked on a hostile campaign against the players of Milan, the net result of which was that three of their players landed up in jail for their behaviour in the second leg. Estudiantes were simply not concerned with playing football and their attitude ultimately led to the European sides giving the tournament the cold shoulder.

Throughout the 1970s the World Club Championship turned into a non-event as one after another of the European Cup winners decided they could not be bothered to play in the matches. Ajax, Bayern Munich and Liverpool on two occasions each refused to take part whilst Nottingham Forest in 1979 made it seven editions that had not contained the top European side.

Had it not been for the intervention in 1980 of the Japanese, who offered to stage the event, with Toyota as the sponsor, the World Club Championship would have almost certainly been consigned to the scrapheap. Instead it has become a stable annual event that has been contested over a single leg in the National Stadium in Tokyo.

Some of the games have even been entertaining, a feature not really in evidence since the first three series. South America has a better overall record, despite a succession of European wins in the late 1980s, and the fact that it is not uncommon to see a South American playing for a European side but not the other way around.

The World Club Championship looks set to stay. FIFA, who at the moment are not involved with the event, may wish to see it expanded to include Africa, Asia and Central America, at which point they would give it offical sanction, but that does not seem to be on the cards just yet.

COPA INTER AMERICA

The Inter-American Cup is an occasional series played between the winners of the Copa Libertadores and the winners of the CONCACAF Cup. The winners of the former have always been more interested in the annual challenge against the European champions and the fixture against their CONCACAF counterparts has suffered as a result. However, the South American champions have on occasion been persuaded to play, mainly when the financial incentives have been good enough. Mexican sides have provided the toughest opposition.

AFRO-ASIAN CLUB CUP

Denied an intercontinental club championship by the Europeans and South Americans, the African (CAF) and Asian (AFC) federations decided to organise their own annual event between the winners of the African Champions Cup and the Asian Champion Teams Cup. Not surprisingly, the African clubs have had much the better of things.

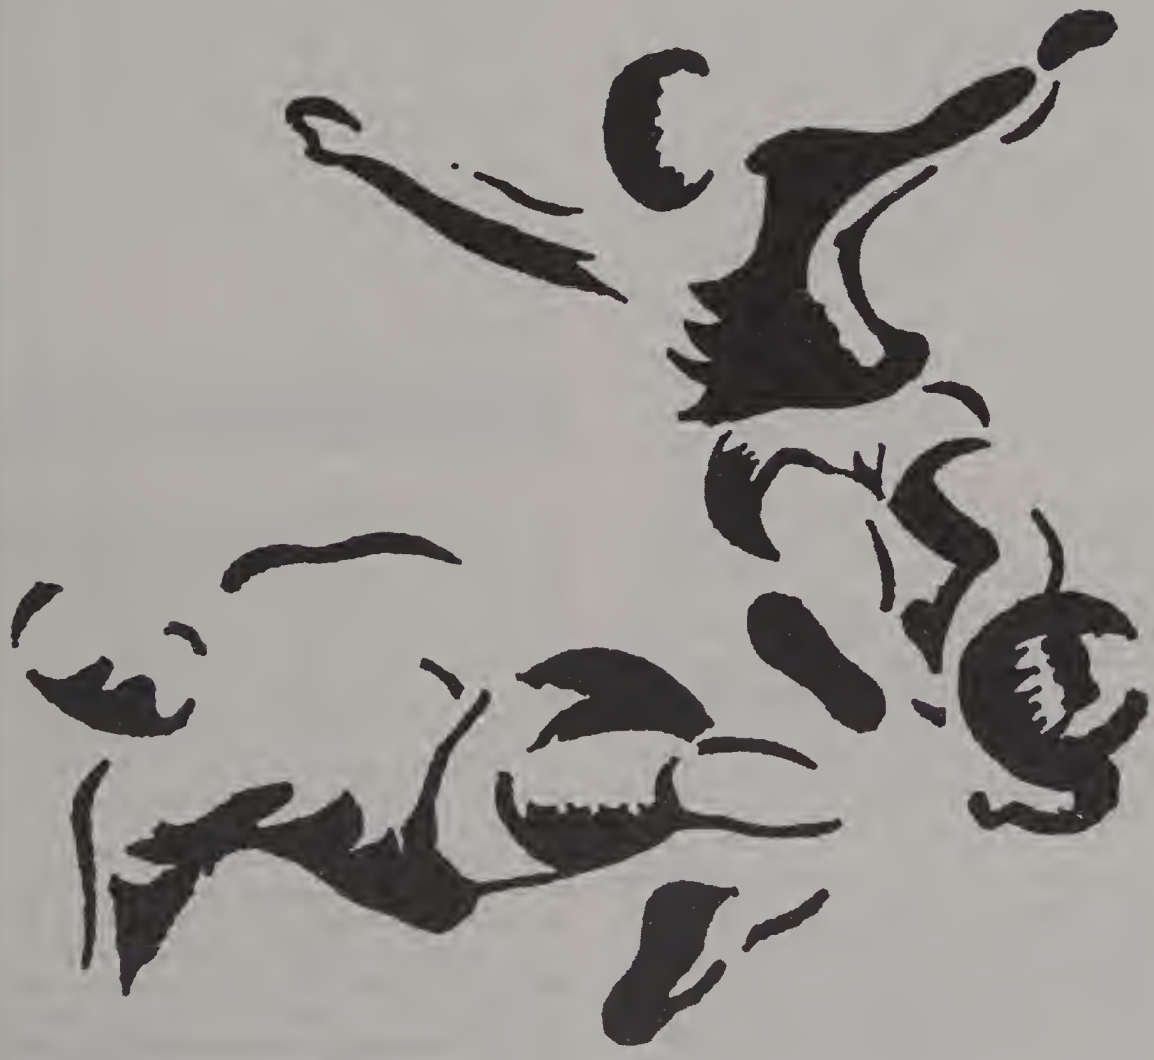
1985	Daewoo Royals	KOR	2-0	FAR Rabat	MOR
1986	Zamalek	EGY	2-0	Furukawa	JAP
1987	Al Ahly	EGY	3-1 1-0	Yomiuri	JAP
1988	Entente Sétif	ALG	2-0 3-1	Al Saad	QAT
1991	Club Africain	TUN	2-1 2-2	Al Hilal	KSA
1992	WAC Casablanca	MOR	0-0 2-0	Pass	IRN
1993	Thai Farmers Bank	THA	1-2 1-0	Zamalek	EGY

AFRO-ASIAN CUP OF NATIONS

At the same time as the Afro-Asian Club Cup was introduced, a tournament for the champions of both continents was also launched. As the Asian Cup is played every four years compared to every two for the African Nations Cup, the competition has had obvious logistical difficulties. One answer has been for the Asian Games winner to stand in to keep up the two-year cycle, and this happened for the 1987 edition, won by South Korea. Since then the tournament has been played only once.

1985	Cameroon	4-1 1-2	Saudi Arabia
1987	South Korea	1-1 4-3p	Egypt
1991	Algeria	1-2 1-0	Iran
1993	Japan	1-0	Côte d'Ivoire

EUROPE



WORLD SOCCER

Europe is without question the centre of world football. The game has been played there in its modern form for longer than anywhere else, it boasts six times more registered clubs than both South America and Asia, its nearest rivals, and for many years players from all over the world have migrated to Europe to play their football.

From very austere beginnings in the north of England, competitive club football in Europe has grown into a huge business that occupies many television hours a week, and not just within Europe – one can travel to almost anywhere in the world and still find the odd snippet of Italian, English, German or Spanish league football on the local television stations.

The British, having founded the modern game in 1863, were instrumental in its spread across the continent. Many of the great English amateur teams of the late 19th century, such as the Middlesex Wanderers, undertook continental tours, whilst British residents were always willing to play a game wherever they lived. It is perhaps fortunate that Britain and France, who took to the game from a very early stage, were the major world powers at the time rather than America, for otherwise we might all now be playing American football and baseball instead.

FIFA, at the time of its foundation, was very much a European affair, and it was perhaps this heavy European bias that delayed the formation of UEFA until 1954, fifty years after FIFA's birth. Although many international matches both at club and national level were played before 1954, the real growth of competitive games took place after that date. Tournaments like the British and Scandinavian Championships had been organised by the relevant national associations, whilst special committees were set up to run tournaments like the Mitropa Cup and the International (later Dr Gerö) Cup.

The introduction of the European Champion Clubs Cup, known commonly as the European Cup, was the real turning point in the history of European football, followed in 1958 by the European Nations Cup, later known as the European Football Championship. For the first time a rigid structure for both club and international football was set in place. National teams embarked on two-year playing schedules, alternately for the World Cup and European Championship.

The European Cup, the Cup-Winners Cup and the Fairs/UEFA Cup have also added a much more competitive edge to club football in each country. The chance to play in one of the European competitions is every footballer's ambition, but it also means more revenue for the clubs involved. All these competitions have helped keep European football in the limelight. Players' reputations are gained or lost in them, whilst the European Cup final every May is the highlight of the season's calendar.

Europe has seen many boundary changes in the 20th century but none have had as much impact on football as those of the early 1990s. Many new countries have emerged, others have disappeared. Gone are Czechoslovakia, East Germany and the Soviet Union, who between them won two European Championships and four Olympic titles. Welcomed into the fold, nations as diverse as Slovakia, Moldova and Azerbaijan. Membership of UEFA, which had remained largely constant since the war, stood at 34 in 1989. That number has now risen to 49, the Soviet Union alone spawning 12 new nations.

These changes have visibly affected the structure of European football. The European Championship has been enlarged to cope with the growing numbers. For many years most qualifying groups contained just four teams. Now six is the norm, which means space has to be found in an ever busier calendar for an extra four games. A qualifying competition involving 48 countries to produce just seven qualifiers was not thought worthwhile, and instead of the usual eight finalists, Euro '96 in England will have 16.

Club football has also undergone structural changes, none more so than the European Cup. With 49 champion teams the tournament was likely to become unwieldy, so for the 1994-95 edition only the 24 top-ranked nations were allowed to enter their champions. The others were accommodated in an ever-increasing UEFA Cup.

Another impact from the changes has been on UEFA's role within FIFA. With their say at the FIFA Congress enhanced by having more votes, the Europeans have begun to flex their muscles again in the world game. Yet UEFA also faces difficult problems itself. With an expanding European Community likely to include all the major footballing powers by the end of the decade, the federation's restrictions on the movement of players across national boundaries will almost certainly be challenged.

There is no doubt, however, that Europe will continue to be the central attraction in the world game. Its clubs are richer and its leagues more diverse than anywhere else. New powers will emerge, like Croatia, with sides that can match the best. Others will take longer to make an impact, held back, like Bosnia and Armenia, by political instability and civil war. With a territory that stretches over 5000 kilometres from Iceland in the north-west to Azerbaijan in the south-east, UEFA's Europe is now a continent as diverse as Asia and Africa – but containing the likes of Germany, Italy, England and Spain, no less dominant for it.

THE EUROPEAN FOOTBALL CHAMPIONSHIP

1960	Soviet Union	2-1	Yugoslavia
1964	Spain	2-1	Soviet Union
1968	Italy	1-1 2-0	Yugoslavia
1972	West Germany	3-0	Soviet Union
1976	Czechoslovakia	2-2 5-4p	West Germany
1980	West Germany	2-1	Belgium
1984	France	2-0	Spain
1988	Holland	2-0	Soviet Union
1992	Denmark	2-0	Germany

Europe was the last continent to organise a championship for its members, just pipped to the post by Africa and Asia but some way behind both South and Central America. This seems odd given the opportunities that were available before it finally got underway in 1958. Odder still was the fact that West Germany, Italy, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Sweden, Finland, Luxembourg and the four British nations did not enter the first edition. Scotland and West Germany did not enter the second edition either.

Originally called the European Nations Cup, the trophy was named after Henri Delaunay, the French football administrator and former General Secretary of UEFA, whose idea the competition was. From humble beginnings the championship has grown steadily and is now without question the number two event in football after the World Cup.

The first two editions were played entirely on a knockout basis. Since then qualifying groups have been added and the final tournament has grown from having an initial four teams, through eight (1980-92) to the present sixteen (from 1996). For many years it was actually harder to qualify for the finals of the European Championship than it was for the World Cup, and the likes of Italy and Spain have missed out on more than one occasion. The list of winners, too, reflects this diversity. Only the Germans have won it more than once.

The early dominant powers were the countries of the Eastern bloc. Three of the four semi-finalists in 1960 were from behind the Iron Curtain, and the biggest of them all, the Soviet Union, won, beating Yugoslavia 2-1 in the final. France hosted the final stages, but despite home advantage lost a thrilling semi-final 5-4 to Yugoslavia.

The Soviet Union again reached the final four years later but lost to Spain. In 1960 the Spanish had pulled out of their quarter-final tie with the Soviets, who were regarded as politically unsuitable by the right-wing Franco government. Thankfully there were no such problems the second time around as Spain had been chosen to host the final tournament. Home advantage was made to count with a 2-1 extra-time victory over Hungary in the semi-finals and there was a repeat scoreline in the final against the Soviets.

The 1968 tournament saw the introduction of eight qualifying groups. Scotland at last entered, as did West Germany. The biggest surprise was the elimination of Portugal by Bulgaria, but the Bulgarians then lost in the quarter-finals to Italy, who were awarded the hosting of the final tournament. Italy's semi-final victory over the Soviet Union was somewhat fortuitous in that after a 0-0 draw, they won on the toss of a coin. Meanwhile, the world champions England were losing to a late goal against Yugoslavia and had to be content with a third-place victory over the Soviets. A replay was needed in the final but the Italians eventually triumphed, leaving the poor Yugoslavs to collect yet another runners-up medal.

The 1972 tournament again saw the eastern Europeans put in a strong challenge, and again the Soviet Union made it to the final. This was West Germany's tournament, however. They were at their very best and reached the final by beating England in the quarter-finals and Belgium in the semis. The Belgians had been chosen to host the tournament after beating Italy, but they were no match for the Germans. Gerd Müller was in devastating form, and his goals sealed the title for his team.

Neither Italy nor England made it past the qualifying stage in 1976, but as the tournament progressed it all looked set for a repeat of the World Cup final of two years previously between West Germany and Holland. Czechoslovakia, England's conquerors in the qualifying round, put a spanner in the works by defeating the Dutch in the semi-finals with two very late goals in extra time. West Germany also needed two goals in the second period of extra time to beat the hosts Yugoslavia, who earlier in the match had looked as if they would run away with the game. In the final the Germans left it very late again to score their equalising goal but lost in the penalty shoot-out – the first ever in the European Championships – to the Czechs, who were crowned as Europe's unlikely champions. In five tournaments, five different nations had won Europe's top prize.

A new format was adopted for the 1980 championship. The hosts, Italy, were chosen at the outset, instead of after the quarter-final round as had been the practice, and were given a bye to the final tournament. The quarter-finals were done away with, the seven group winners now proceeding to a final tournament consisting of two groups of four, the winners of which would contest the final. The Soviet Union was the surprise absentee, and Yugoslavia did not make the trip either. Greece made their first ever appearance in the finals of a major tournament, and West Germany became the only nation to win the competition twice when they beat the surprise package, Belgium, 2-1 in the final. Hrubesch's winning goal came two minutes from time.

The group matches were marred by violence on the terraces involving the English supporters, and it was to the great relief of the authorities that England were knocked out in the first round. They also headed the list of big names failing to qualify for the 1984 tournament, for which France were chosen as hosts. New stadia were built and old ones refurbished in preparation, and in the end it proved worthwhile as the public were treated to the best ever championship. The French, in particular, were brilliant, and their victory partially compensated for their semi-final loss in the 1982 World Cup. Michel Platini was inspired and his nine goals in five matches were the crucial factor in the hosts' success. It was Platini who scored the opening goal in the final, which France won 2-0, and the winner against Portugal in the dramatic semi-final at Marseille, one of the great matches of all time. Denmark also shone, but failed in a penalty shoot-out against Spain in the other semi-final.

The Dutch made it seven different winners in eight tournaments with victory in West Germany in 1988. France were notable absentees, but England were back, as were the Italians, whilst the Republic of Ireland made a surprise first appearance and exceeded all expectations. Despite being among the favourites, England were a massive disappointment and it was the Dutch and the Soviet Union who qualified from group 2 to meet West Germany and Italy respectively in the semi-finals. Marco Van Basten, the star of the tournament, put the hosts out with two minutes remaining in the semi-final and was on target again in the final against the Soviets. Playing football reminiscent of their golden age in the 1970s, Holland thrilled the crowd in Munich with their display, and at last won an international honour.

Four years later, in perhaps the most extraordinary championships ever, Denmark, to the surprise of everyone, won the tournament in neighbouring Sweden, having failed initially to qualify for the finals - Yugoslavia were expelled and their place given to the Danes, who had finished second to them in their qualifying group. Italy and Spain were absent and it was not a good tournament for the established powers as both France and England bowed out in the first round, while the Germans might easily have joined them. Holland, after a fine first round, fell under the Danish spell and were knocked out in the semi-finals. No-one believed that the injury-hit Danes could repeat the feat against Germany in the final, but they did. In a splendid display of defence and counter-attack, they ran out 2-0 winners.

OTHER SENIOR TOURNAMENTS

THE DR. GERÖ / INTERNATIONAL CUP

The International Cup, as it was originally known, was the brainchild of Hugo Meisl, one of the dominant personalities of inter-war European football administration. The competition brought together four of the most powerful European nations of the time, Italy, Austria, Czechoslovakia and Hungary, as well as Switzerland and, in the final edition, Yugoslavia. It was ranked with the British International Championships as the most important of the regional competitions of the time, ahead of the Scandinavian, Balkan and Baltic Cups.

Usually played over two years, six editions of the tournament were started but only five finished, the 1936-37 series being cut short by the hostile political climate of the time and the annexation of Austria by Germany. It was played twice after the Second World War, both tournaments taking a marathon five years to complete, but when the European Championship was introduced in 1958 the organisers felt that much of the justification for the event was gone, and it was discontinued in 1960.

Honours were evenly spread over the years. Italy were the only side to win twice, a fair reflection of their inter-war strength, whilst the Austrian "Wunderteam" gained just recognition for their good football by winning the second series. Not surprisingly the great Hungarian team of the late 1940s and early 1950s won the first post-war edition (1948-53) and it was the other Eastern bloc country, Czechoslovakia, who won the last title. Only Switzerland did not manage to win at least one tournament, finishing last in each series.

THE MITROPA CUP

The Mitropa Cup was the most glamorous competition in Europe in the inter-war years and was the forerunner of today's European club competitions. The idea to have clubs from different countries playing a knock-out cup had been touted for some years and Hugo Meisl, as well as launching the International Cup for national sides, introduced the Mitropa Cup the same year. The name Mitropa is a shortened form of Mittel Europa, meaning middle Europe, and entry was restricted to Italy, Austria, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Switzerland, and occasionally Romania and Yugoslavia. Initially only the champion team of each country was allowed to enter, but this was increased to the top two and, at one point, the top four.

The Mitropa Cup was suspended after 1939 and did not get underway again properly until 1955, but with the arrival of the European Cup, it lost much of its significance. None of the best sides were ever entered and in 1980 entry was restricted to the second division champions of the participating countries.

At its height in the inter-war years, the Mitropa Cup drew large crowds and sealed the reputations of many teams. The possibility of taking part certainly helped spice up club football in the area. Large fees were paid for players in a bid to win the tournament, especially by the Italian clubs, who apart from Bologna were surprisingly unsuccessful. Instead it was the cities of Prague, Budapest and Vienna which stole the honours, winning all but two of the titles. Slavia and Sparta Prague won three titles between them, Ferencváros and Ujpesti Budapest won two apiece, whilst Vienna clubs won the other four titles.

THE LATIN CUP

Contested by the champions of Spain, Italy, Portugal and France, the Latin Cup replaced the Mitropa Cup as the top club competition in the immediate post-war period, but it too suffered from the arrival of the new UEFA-sponsored tournaments and was discontinued in 1957. Played in a single city every year, the tournament was curious in that there was not a cup presentation at the end of each edition. Instead, points were awarded – four to the winners down to one for the fourth-placed team – and after fours years the cup itself was awarded to the country with the highest number of combined points.

THE BRITISH INTERNATIONAL CHAMPIONSHIP

Until England and Scotland decided in 1984 that they could no longer justify playing this annual championship with Northern Ireland and Wales, on the grounds of an overcrowded fixture list and dwindling attendances at the matches, the home internationals, as they were called, were the longest running of all the world's competitions.

Started in 1884 as a natural progression from the annual friendly matches that had taken place between the four British nations, the championship was the major feature in their fixture list until after the Second World War. Organised either over the length of the season or over a week at the end of it, the highlight was the England–Scotland game, played alternately in Glasgow and London.

On two occasions the championship was used as a qualifying group for the World Cup (and once for the European Championship) but other members of UEFA were unhappy that this guaranteed Britain a World Cup place. Their complaints rather backfired when the British nations were duly placed in four separate groups for the 1958 World Cup and all four qualified for the finals in Sweden that year!

England and Scotland dominated the home internationals and after 1984 carried on their annual fixture under the guise of the Rous Cup in which another country, usually from South America, was invited to make up a threesome. But after repeated incidents of hooliganism between the English and the Scots, even this tournament went by the board, and in 1990, for the first time ever in peacetime, the most famous "derby" match of them all was not played.

THE SCANDINAVIAN CHAMPIONSHIP

Scandinavia boasted the strongest of the remaining regional tournaments, but this too was dropped as an ever-increasing fixture list crowded it out. Played consecutively from 1924 until 1971, each series lasted four years. Every nation played each other once a year, and when all had played their opponents twice at home and twice away, the winner was the nation with most points. Denmark, Norway and Finland all won one edition but Sweden were easily the strongest of the four as their tally of seven titles suggests.

THE BALTIC CUP

The Baltic Championships may have remained a historical curiosity had it not been for the re-emergence of Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia as independent nations in 1991. Played over the course of a few days in a designated city, the cup was never particularly notable as the three nations were always among the weakest in Europe.

THE BALKAN CUP

The Balkan Cup, played in the 1930s and briefly revived in the 1970s, was a major factor in the development of the game in south-eastern Europe. Though none of the entrants were especially strong during the 1930s, Yugoslavia, Romania and Bulgaria have all enjoyed successful spells since 1945. The tournament remains notable for affording Albania her only international honour to date.

EUROPEAN YOUTH TOURNAMENTS

One of the biggest growth areas in European football over the last 20 years has been the in the number of age-limited tournaments organised. A junior championship was launched in 1948 and until the start of the under-23 tournament in 1972 this was the main age-restricted competition in Europe. With the introduction of two FIFA-controlled world championships, Europe has had to fit in with the qualifying cycle for these tournaments. In 1982 an under-16 tournament was introduced to tie in with the World Under-16 championships, whilst the Under-18 Championships, which had grown out of the European Junior championship, was used to qualify teams foir the World Youth Championship. The other age-restricted tournament, the Under-23 championship, became an under-21 event and since the Barcelona Games has been used as a qualifying round for the Olympics.

EUROPEAN CHAMPIONSHIP FOR WOMEN

The European Championship for women, after an uncertain start, is now a flourishing event, and for two of the last three editions has doubled up as a qualifying tournament for the women's World Cup. Along with North America, Europe is where women's football is at its strongest. The US model is based around the college system, but in Europe the links with the men's game are much stronger. With a strong international calendar established, the next step is for the clubs in each country to venture beyond their own borders.

In Italy internationals have been played regularly since 1968, the same year as a national league for women was introduced. Many of the clubs like Lazio, Milan, Juventus and Bologna, bear the same name as their male counterparts. England also has a league and a cup competition, but the real power lies in Scandinavia. Norway won the second World Cup in 1995 having been runners-up in 1991, and Sweden was a major player in the rebirth of the women's game in the 1970s. Germany is also a power to be reckoned with. A championship has been contested there since 1974 and despite not playing their first international until 1982 they have been European champions three times and were World Cup semi-finalists in 1991.

HISTORY OF THE EUROPEAN CUPS

Europe has three major club competitions. The European Cup is the premier event and until 1994 it was open to all of the continent's champion clubs. Since then, however, only the top 24 UEFA-ranked countries' champions have been allowed to compete. The other two tournaments are the Cup Winners Cup, reserved for the winners of the knock-out competition in each country, and the UEFA Cup, which is for the best of the rest. The number of entries allocated to individual countries in this last competition is determined by a UEFA coefficient table and is based upon past results in all three tournaments. Since 1994 the UEFA Cup, always the largest of the three tournaments, has been even further expanded, taking the overflow of champion clubs from the European Cup.

The European Champion Clubs' Cup, or European Cup as it is more usually known, was the first of the three to get underway. In early 1955, Gabriel Hanot, then editor of L'Equipe, a French daily sports paper, invited representatives to a meeting in Paris to sound out the idea of creating a championship for the major clubs of Europe. Fifteen clubs responded to his invitation by attending the meeting and it was agreed to organise a tournament for the 1955-56 season.

FIFA were willing to support the idea and so UEFA gave the tournament its blessing, and has organised it ever since. The first tournament was curious in that only half of the clubs which took part were the champions of their respective countries. Not until the following season did UEFA manage to restrict it to the current practice of champions (and the previous season's winners) only. Fortunately for the long-term success of the competition, Real Madrid were maturing into one of the best sides club football had ever seen, and in a feat which is almost certain never to be repeated, they won five consecutive editions of the tournament and wrote themselves into football folklore. Ever since these triumphs, the competition has had a special aura about it.

This was not the case with the other two tournaments. At roughly the same time as the meeting arranged by Hanot, Ernst Thommen, a Swiss vice-president of UEFA, invited representatives to Basle with a view to organising a tournament for representative sides from cities in Europe that regularly organised trade fairs. This may have been a somewhat tenuous reason for a tournament, but it was agreed upon, and the International Industries Fairs Inter-Cities Cup was launched in the autumn of 1955.

Commonly known as the Fairs Cup, it drew entrants from ten cities that organised such events. The original idea was for each of these cities to field a representative side from all of the teams located in their city, but this idea did not hold out for very long. Barcelona, the winners of the first edition, fielded a team based purely on players from CF Barcelona, whilst Birmingham simply entered Birmingham City. Originally conceived as a two-year tournament, the first edition lasted for three years during which time only 23 games were played.

The Cup Winners Cup did not have a particularly auspicious start either. To begin with, not every country in Europe had a cup competition. Many did not see the need for one, and it was only in countries like Britain, where the cup goes back further than the league, that they enjoyed any real support. Nevertheless the organising committee of the Mitropa Cup launched the competition for the 1960-61 season, and Europe's trio of cups was on the road.

From the early 1960s to the 1990s the tournament structures remained fairly stable. With there being 32 active members of UEFA for most of that period, the format for the European Cup and Cup Winners Cup was a simple knock-out on a home and away basis, with the highest aggregate scorers going through to the next round. If the scores were level, the team which had scored more goals away from home qualified, and if that could not separate the sides, the winner was decided on penalty kicks. The away-goals system was first used in 1967, before which time an extra game was often played. Penalty kicks were introduced in 1971 to replace the very arbitrary toss of a coin.

The only fixtures not played on a home and away basis are the European Cup final and the Cup Winners Cup final, which are played in a neutral city. Until 1984 the venues were selected at the start of the season, but there was always the danger that the 'home' side would reach the final and on the 10 occasions this happened only once did the visitors win, when Liverpool beat Roma in 1984. Now the venues are decided later in the season to ensure that the ground will be neutral whoever reaches the final.

The UEFA Cup final, by contrast, is played over two legs. Over the years this tournament has been regarded by many as the hardest of the three to win. With twice the number of teams taking part, there is more quality opposition to overcome, and the field very often includes many of the season's eventual domestic champions. Less than half the winners of the European Cup have managed to retain their league title in the same season.

There have been three distinct phases in these European competitions. The first, lasting until the late 1960s, was the period of domination by clubs from southern Europe, notably, Spain, Italy and Portugal. Not until Glasgow Celtic triumphed in 1967 was the European Cup won by a non-Latin side, whilst southern teams were also dominant in the Fairs Cup. Other than Real Madrid, the most notable sides of this period were Barcelona, Valencia and Real Zaragoza from Spain, the two Milan clubs and Roma from Italy, and the two Lisbon clubs, Benfica and Sporting, from Portugal.

The European Cup produced some exciting encounters in these early years, none better than the 1960 final between Real Madrid and Eintracht Frankfurt. Scorer of a hat-trick that day was Alfredo Di Stéfano, and he was without question the leading personality in the tournament until he left Real in 1964. His 49 goals from 58 matches in the European Cup, the only one of the competitions in which he competed, is a record never likely to be equalled.

Eusébio took over Di Stéfano's mantle in the 1960s as his Benfica side reached five finals, winning two of them. In the 1962 clash between Benfica and Real, Eusébio's two goals were instrumental in helping overcome the Madrid giants in what was another scintillating game. Eusébio's all-time goals tally in the Europeean Cup, 47, is second only to Di Stéfano.

Italy was not to be left out and for three seasons running in the first half of the 1960s, the city of Milan ruled Europe. Clubs from northern Europe were beginning to mount a challenge, however. In 1963 Tottenham Hotspur won the Cup Winners Cup and West Ham United matched them two years later. Then Celtic's European Cup win against Internazionale in 1967 signalled a dramatic decline for the established powers as Britain, Holland and Germany began to flex their muscles.

This second phase saw two hat-tricks of European Cup wins, first by Ajax of Holland and then Bayern Munich of West Germany. These followed wins by Manchester United in 1968 and Feyenoord in 1970. The same was happening in the Cup Winners Cup and Fairs Cup. Milan won the Cup Winners Cup in 1968 and 1973, but they were the only Latin side to do so from 1965 until Barcelona won it for the first time in 1979.

The Fairs Cup was becoming very much an English affair by the late 1960s with six victories on the trot. It was in the late 1970s, however, that English clubs really came into their own, especially in the European Cup. Seven victories in eight years by three teams from England, most notably Liverpool, represents the best run of any country in the European Cup, but this period also heralded a decline in the number of goals scored, especially in the finals. The first five finals produced 26 goals; it took 19 finals after 1975 for the same number to be reached.

The year 1985 marked a turning point in European football. For many years the game had been plagued by hooliganism from the supporters. The 1975 European Cup final in Paris was marred by supporters of Leeds United tearing the stadium to pieces as their team lost to Bayern Munich, whilst the previous year supporters of Tottenham and Feyenoord had wrecked the UEFA Cup final. Whenever the English travelled abroad they seemed to leave a trail of destruction behind them.

The whole sordid problem came to a head at the 1985 European Cup final between Liverpool and Juventus when 39 supporters, mainly Italians, were crushed to death in the Heysel stadium in Brussels. The English clubs paid the price and were banned from all European competitions indefinitely.

Though free of English hooligans, the European competitions suffered without the English clubs who had done so well until 1985. Goals in the final of the European Cup threatened to dry up all together as three finals finished 0-0 and had to be settled by penalties. The hooligan problem did not go away either, as there seemed to be an active element in most countries determined to copy the English.

However, this third phase in European club football was also marked by the rise of the Latin countries again, especially Italy, whose clubs, free from a ban on importing players, bought up the best. Milan most notably have revived past glories with three European Cup wins including two crushing 4-0 victories, but Juventus, Internazionale, Napoli, Parma and Sampdoria have all won one or other of the competitions.

The 1990s have seen wholesale changes in European club football. In 1991 English clubs were readmitted, and although they have not managed to reach the heights of previous years, there have been wins in the Cup Winners Cup for Manchester United and Arsenal. The increasing number of countries affiliated to UEFA has proved something of a headache, with extensive pre-qualifying now necessary in the UEFA Cup and Cup Winners Cup.

There is also a clear desire on the part of the continent's biggest clubs to reap the maximum reward from European competition. For many years the idea of a European Super League had been mooted, thwarted only by the adverse effect it would have on the national leagues. However, in 1992 a Champions League of two divisions replaced the knock-out stages of the European Cup from the quarter-finals onwards, and in 1995 the League was expanded to four groups of four teams and switched to replace the first and second rounds, with the knock-out format returning for the quarter-finals. For UEFA and the lucky 16 clubs, it meant that lucrative television contracts could no longer be compromised by an inconvenient early exit.

To the end of the 1994-95 season

ALBANIA

In 1946 on their international debut, the Albanians won their only honour to date, the Balkan Cup, defeating both Romania and Bulgaria to lift the trophy on their own soil. Since then success has been muted to say the least, and despite impressive victories over Czechoslovakia in 1952 and Belgium in 1984, Albania have amassed one of the poorest records in international football.

This small Balkan country does hold one curious record in world football, however. A 1980s study on attendances found that, as a percentage of the population as a whole, more people went to football matches in Albania than anywhere else.

Like her Balkan neighbours, Albania was for centuries under Turkish rule, and at the beginning of the 20th century, although football was played by foreign residents in Tirana, the Turks did all they could to stop the locals playing. It was not until 1930 therefore, that an association was formed and a league competition introduced.

The stability was short-lived however; in 1939 Mussolini annexed Albania and all competition stopped. In the turbulent year of 1944, the country was taken over by the Communists under Enver Hoxha, and until the death of Stalin in 1953, Albania looked to be entering into the mainstream of European football. Hoxha fell out with the new Soviet leaders, however, and so Albania cut herself off from the Eastern bloc as well, and between 1954 and 1963 played only one international in Europe, against East Germany, preferring instead the company of the equally hard-line Communist Chinese. Many matches were played between the two countries, but as the Chinese were not members of FIFA, only one of these 'full' internationals is recognised as such.

In 1963, Albania unexpectedly entered the European Nations Cup but unfortunately for the organisers were drawn against Greece, historically their bitter rivals, who refused to play them. Albania were given a walkover to the next round where they met Denmark, losing 4-0 in Copenhagen before a consolation 1-0 triumph at home in the return. The following year a 2-0 defeat in Rotterdam marked their first World Cup experience. Although they were fairly regular competitors at international level for the rest of the decade and into the early 1970s, the Albanians then went back into their shell until the early 1980s, since when they have not missed a qualifying campaign for either World Cup or European Championship.

The club sides in Albania have followed much the same pattern in terms of European participation. In 1988 Flamurtari enjoyed the best-ever run by an Albanian club in Europe when they reached the third round of the UEFA Cup, knocking out Partizan Belgrade and winning the home leg of their tie against Barcelona.

Domestically, since the fall of the communist government, clubs from Tirana have not been so dominant, but the loss of state patronage has meant that increasingly, clubs are following the age-old pattern of selling their best players abroad. The modern generation of exports includes Sulejman Demollari, Albania's most capped player, who started a very successful career with Dinamo Bucharest in Romania.

ARMENIA

Armenia was not totally unknown in football circles before the break-up of the Soviet Union, thanks to the top club in the country, Ararat Yerevan. Boasting Soviet internationals like Oganesian, Andreasian and Bondarenko, Ararat won the 'double' in 1973 and reached the quarter-finals of the 1975 European Cup where they lost to the eventual winners, Bayern Munich.

European competition returned to Yerevan in 1994 after Ararat won the 1993 Armenian championship, although with entry to the European Cup now restricted, they qualified only for the expanded UEFA Cup. They fell at the first hurdle, losing 3-0 on aggregate to Bulgaria's CSKA Sofia.

The national team made their international debut in May 1994 against the United States in Fullerton, and in September that year played their first competitive international, a 2-0 defeat in Brussels against Belgium. That was in the qualifying tournament for the 1996 European Championships, in which they were grouped with Spain, Belgium, Denmark, Macedonia and Cyprus.

Sadly, Armenia is a nation at war with another of the ex-Soviet republics, Azerbaijan. The two countries have fought a bitter battle over Nagorno-Karabakh, an Armenian enclave in Azeri territory, and UEFA will hopefully ensure that their paths do not cross in European competitions in the near future.

AUSTRIA

September 12th, 1991 will go down as a landmark in Austrian football. Before a handful of spectators in Landskrona, Sweden, the national side lost 1-0 to a Faeroe Islands team playing its very first competitive international match. How the mighty have fallen! For Vienna, in the first half of the 20th century, was at the very hub of European football. Now it is little more than a sideshow.

The very first international match on mainland Europe took place on Viennese soil and until the 1960s Austria lived up to this proud tradition. Vienna was one of the three great cities of the Austro-Hungarian empire along with Budapest and Prague, and the legend of the 'Danubian school of football' was born even before the three cities became the capitals of their own separate countries after the First World War. Austrian teams became synonymous with skilful ball-players who combined clever short passing movements with innovative tactics. Austria was also innovative off the field. The great Hugo Meisl was one of the game's greatest administrators, and it was largely due to his efforts that football became so popular in central Europe.

The large British community in Vienna formed the basis from which football developed. Naturally, English teams were invited to play there and in 1900 Southampton visited and gave a display that greatly encouraged the development of the game, beating a Vienna selection 6-0. A cup had been introduced for teams from Vienna three years previously, and as the name of the first winners, Cricketers, suggests, British influence was strong. It was to Budapest, however, that Austrian teams turned for more regular opposition. Hungarian clubs were invited to take part in Der Challenge-Cup, and on 12 October 1902 the most significant event to that date on mainland Europe took place. Before 500 spectators and an English referee, Austria beat Hungary 5-0 in an international match that was to be the first of thousands on the continent.

The Hungary match became an annual event but opposition was also found in matches against Germany and Italy. In 1912 Austria entered the Stockholm Olympics and although Germany were well beaten in the first round, a strong Dutch side beat the Austrians 3-1 in the quarter-finals. In a consolation tournament organised for the teams that did not reach the semi-finals, Austria lost in the final to Hungary.

At the same time that international football was gaining a foothold, clubs were being created across the country but especially in Vienna. Along with the Cricketers, who are no longer in existence, 1894 also saw the founding of First Vienna who to this day retain the English spelling of their name. In 1898 Sportklub Rapid arrived on the scene as a workers' club, and they were joined in 1911 by their greatest rivals Amateure, who later became known as FK Austria. The governing body of Austrian football was formed in 1904 and joined FIFA in 1905, a year after FIFA's own formation. A league was set up in 1911, taking over from Der Challenge-Cup as the source of competition in Vienna. The league was contested entirely by teams from Vienna, and it was not until 1949 that clubs from other cities were invited to take part. The same was true of the Vienna Cup introduced in 1919.

The inter-war period was Austria's most successful era. Success in the Mitropa Cup and the International Cup helped seal her reputation. The Mitropa Cup especially caught the imagination of the public and huge crowds turned up to see the annual games. Rapid, FK Austria and First Vienna all won the tournament, whilst in the International Cup, the national team finished as runners-up in the first tournament and won the second. Victory in the 1930-32 edition saw the Austrians at their very best. Dubbed as the 'Wunderteam' the exploits of this side are never likely to be equalled by another Austrian side. After losing to Italy in early 1931. Austria enjoyed a spell lasting until June 1934 when they took on all-comers and generally beat them convincingly - 101 goals were scored in 30 games, and though Austria did not stay undefeated in this time, one of the two defeats suffered was at the hands of England, in London, a game in which the English were lucky not to lose their unbeaten home record 20 years before they finally did.

The names of the members of the 'Wunderteam' will echo down through the ages. The forward line was one of the most fearsome ever fielded, spearheaded by a man called der Papierne, 'the man of paper', due to his slight build. This was Matthias Sindelar who until the emergence of Hans Krankl in the 1970s was Austria's most celebrated player. He scored 27 goals for his country as did his forward partner Schall, who along with Gschweidl, Zischek, Vogel and later Binder and Bican were the terror of defences across the continent. Sadly however, aside from the International Cup victory, there was to be no lasting honour to mark the quality of this side. The 1934 World Cup was there for the taking and had it been played anywhere other than Italy, Austria might well have won it.

Instead, after having disposed of both France and Hungary, they met Italy in the semi-finals in Milan. Home advantage and a muddy pitch settled the match 1-0 in favour of the more robust Italians. Demoralised by the defeat, the Austrians also lost the third place play-off to Germany four days later.

Italy were again Austria's downfall two years later in the 1936 Olympic Games, this time in the final. Playing without all their well-known players, who by this time were all professionals and therefore ineligible, the Austrians were not expected to progress far, and the fact that they reached the final owed much to a man who had helped mould the Austrian game for over 20 years – Jimmy Hogan, an Englishman who felt more at home away from England, a country that never appreciated his talents, had coached in Austria on and off since 1912, and worked in Germany and Hungary. His work as coach of the team for the 1936 Olympics was his crowning glory and to this day the Olympic Final remains the only major final the Austrians have ever played in.

Hitler soon put paid to any aspirations the Austrians may have had of winning the 1938 World Cup. United into a greater Germany in March 1938, 'Austrian' football ceased to exist, and although three international matches were played by the Germans in Vienna, all three were during the war. Austrian club sides were not so easily submerged, however. Rapid won the German Cup in 1938 and were German champions in 1941, whilst First Vienna won the Cup in 1943.

Remarkably, when the Austrians next took the field for an international match, on 19 August 1945 in a match against Hungary, four of the side were survivors from the previous game in October 1937 against Czechoslovakia. Sindelar was not amongst them, however. Contrary to some reports which had him dying in a concentration camp for Jews during the war, Sindelar was not Jewish and had in fact committed suicide in 1939. At his funeral, 20,000 people turned out to pay their respects to possibly the greatest Austrian footballer ever.

In 1948 Austria entered the London Olympics but there was no repeat of their previous success as they lost 3-0 in the first round against Sweden, who went on to win the tournament. Like many European countries, Austria shunned the 1950 World Cup, but in the meantime, under Walter Nausch a new team was being moulded. The dynamos of the side were Ernst Ocwirk and Gerhard Hanappi and they inspired the Austrians to the semi-finals of the 1954 World Cup. Portugal were beaten 9-1 in the qualifiers and in the final tournament the goals carried on flowing. That so many goals were scored in the tournament was in no small part due to a remarkable game between Austria and their hosts. The final score of 7-5 in favour of the Austrians is the highest ever score in the World Cup finals and is unlikely to be beaten. Their 6-1 defeat at the hands of Germany in the semi-finals, however, surprised even the Germans. Once again the Austrians had fallen at a hurdle they were expected to conquer with ease. There was to be no third attempt at winning a World Cup semi-final. From 1954 onwards, the Austrians became increasing happy just to qualify for the finals.

Austria's triumphs until the early 1950s are best seen in the light of what was still very much an amateur game, but at which they were professionals. With a population of only seven million, the increasing commercialisation of the game was bound to leave them behind. A none too happy outing at the 1958 World Cup was followed by failure to qualify again until 1978, and seven attempts to qualify for the European Championship finals have all ended in disappointment. Club football has suffered too. As the league was extended to include provincial teams, many of the great club sides of the 1920s and 1930s either fell by the wayside or merged with others in an effort to stay solvent. Austrian clubs have also fared badly in the European club competitions, although FK Austria and Rapid have both reached the final of the Cup Winners Cup and the provincial side Casino Salzburg were runners-up in the UEFA Cup.

Austria does, however, continue to produce fine players, although they rarely stay in Austria for their club football. The late 1970s and early 1980s saw some success at international level. Hans Krankl along with Walter Schachner, Herbert Prohaska, Bruno Pezzey and Kurt Jara led the Austrians to two World Cup qualifications, in 1978 and 1982. In the 1978 finals, victories over Spain and Sweden ensured a place in the second round, where despite beating the reigning champions West Germany, they lost to both the Dutch and the Italians. The 1982 tournament will always be remembered for the great Gijón swindle in which the West Germans and Austrians contrived a result that saw both teams through at the expense of Algeria. Once in the second round the Austrians came up against France who ensured their elimination with a 1-0 victory in Madrid.

Failure to qualify for the 1986 Mexico World Cup due to the presence of their eternal rivals Hungary, was followed by qualification for Italy in 1990. Though much was expected of a forward line that included Polster, Rodax and Ogris, Austria could not proceed beyond the first round. If that was perhaps to be expected, what happened the following September in their European Championship match against the Faeroes was not. The defeat at the hands of the part-timers was deeply embarrassing and ensured that once again the European Championship would bring no joy to the Austrians.

To cap a sorry period for the national side, they were never in the running for a place in the 1994 World Cup finals either. For Austrian football there was consolation only in Casino Salzburg's dazzling run to the final of the 1994 UEFA Cup. They defeated Sporting Lisbon, Eintracht Frankfurt and Karlsruhe on the way, but failed to overcome Internazionale and so missed out on being the first Austrian club side to land a European title.

AZERBAIJAN

Nestling on the northern border of Iran and on the western shores of the Caspian Sea, Azerbaijan seems a little out of place in 'Europe'. Countries such as Syria and Iraq all lie to the west, closer to the European heartland. But as a former member of the Soviet Union, oil-rich Azerbaijan has fallen into UEFA's sphere of influence. This predominantly moslem country is potentially one of the wealthiest in Europe, though the war with Armenia over the disputed territory of Nagorno-Karabakh has left it in some turmoil.

Football has very little tradition in Azerbaijan. Neftchi Baku, from the capital, were occasional participants in the Soviet first division but rarely shone, and since the country was accepted into the European football fold, little has gone right.

A 5-0 defeat at the hands of Malta was an ominously poor start to their international career, and Baku was not able to stage any of the home matches in the qualifying round of the 1996 European Championships because of the war. Instead, Trabzon in Turkey was the venue for Azerbaijan's first 'home' international match, against Israel.

BELARUS

Belarus, bordered by Russia, Poland, Ukraine and the Baltic States, is one of the few republics to have a club side who were champions of the old Soviet league; Dinamo Minsk won the title in 1982, the last team from outside Russia and the Ukraine to do so. Not surprisingly, they won the first three titles after independence and in 1994, as a mark of their superiority, their second team were runners-up! Indeed the only two games they lost in that championship were to the reserve side.

Neman Grodno have been the only team to break Dinamo's monopoly, winning the Cup in 1993, but they failed to negotiate the preliminary round of the Cup Winners Cup the following season, losing heavily to the Swiss club Lugano. Dinamo reached the quarter-finals of all three European competitions in 1980s, but more recently they too have struggled.

The best-known Belarussian, Sergei Aleinikov, who was capped 77 times by the Soviet Union and played for Juventus, has helped the national side adapt to their new role. So far they have not been disgraced – they even beat Holland in the 1996 European Championship qualifiers.

BELGIUM

Belgians have been playing football for longer than most; but, hidebound by tradition, they were held back for years from modernising their domestic game. Since the restrictions were removed in the 1960s, the Belgians have proved to be one of the more enduring forces of both European and world football. They are a divided nation – the north is largely Flemish-speaking, the south dominated by the French-speaking Walloons – but this rivalry has helped bring more passion to the club scene.

Belgium was at the forefront of organised football on the continent. The Association was formed in 1895, and a league started the following year, thus making it, along with Sweden, the oldest league in Europe outside of Great Britain. Naturally the Belgians were prime movers in the formation of FIFA in 1904, and in the same year played their first international, making their debut against France who were also playing their first game. The following year, Belgium met Holland in Antwerp. Over the course of the first half of the century, the Belgium-France match became an annual event, whilst the Belgium-Holland game was usually played twice a year, one at home and one away.

A large number of clubs had been formed by the turn of the century, the oldest of them, Royal Antwerp, having been founded in 1880. RFC Liège won the inaugural championship, and although some of the famous clubs of this time no longer survive as separate entities, they survive as combinations that have since merged. Although teams were very active in the league, they remained true to the amateur spirit. The sport was seen very much as a pastime, and this meant that progress at both club and national level was slow.

In 1920, Belgium won their only ever major honour, beating Czechoslovakia in the final of the Olympic Games. At the time only the British Isles were professional, so with some justification the Belgians regarded themselves as world champions. The fact that the tournament was held in Belgium and occurred in the immediate aftermath of World War I does take some shine off the honour, and in subsequent years Belgium did not live up to the reputation gained by winning the tournament.

Results in the inter-war period were poor and saw defeats in the first round of every tournament entered, with the exception of the 1928 Olympic Games where they beat Luxembourg in the first round only to lose heavily to Argentina in the quarter-finals. The Belgian FA was heavily involved in promoting the idea of the World Cup, and so when it was launched they were one of the few European nations to make the trip to Uruguay. They were spectacularly unsuccessful once there, but one Belgian did make an impression. Jean Langenus became the first man to referee the World Cup Final, resplendent as he was in knickerbockers and cap.

Very few players of this period can be regarded as of the highest class. Two who were, however, were the Braine brothers, Raymond and Pierre. Raymond has often been regarded as one of the all-time greats of Belgian football, and in its amateur state, it could not keep him. He helped Beerschot to four titles in five years in the 1920s, playing alongside his brother, and after being refused a work permit to play in England he joined Sparta Prague in 1931 as a professional, winning many honours.

The post-war years saw no dramatic improvement. Anderlecht became the dominant club and by the 1960s were at the forefront of a movement to modernise the game, which they felt was decaying at the roots. The newly introduced European Cup was an important influence, never more so than in 1956 when Anderlecht suffered an embarrassing 10-0 defeat at the hands of Manchester United. Semi-professionalism was grudgingly introduced and foreigners known as 'Independents' were brought in to pep up a flagging club scene.

In 1970 Anderlecht reached the final of the Fairs Cup, the first international success of note for a Belgian team. They lost to Arsenal but their achievement marked the beginning of a new era in Belgian football. The introduction of full professionalism in 1972 gave the country the final impetus it needed to perform at the highest level as Anderlecht, Club Brugge and Standard Liège all found that they could compete with the best when on an equal footing. In 1976 Anderlecht won the Cup Winners Cup, the first honour for any Belgian side since 1920, and followed up with victory in the same competition two years later and the UEFA Cup in 1983. In 1978 Club Brugge lost in the European Cup final to Liverpool, the closest any Belgian side has come to winning Europe's premier trophy. Perhaps the most surprising success was that of Mechelen, a small town in the north. They emerged in the late 1980s to break the big three's traditional stranglehold on honours and in the process lift the European Cup Winners Cup and the Super Cup.

The Belgian league can now claim to be one of the best in Europe, though it still lacks the strength in depth of Italy, Germany, England and Spain. It has overcome serious problems, none greater than the bribes scandal of 1984 involving Standard. It was discovered that that two years previously they had bought the vital league game against Waterschei which they won to clinch the title, and top players such as Eric Gerets and Michel Preud'homme were implicated along with coach Raymond Goethals.

Historically the national side has followed a similar pattern to the clubs. Although famous names such as Jef Mermans, Pol Anoul, Rik Coppens, Jef Jurion and especially Paul Van Himst represented Belgium during the 1950s and 1960s, they achieved little. Indeed the 1970 World Cup was the first time since 1954 that they had qualified for the final tournament, and once there they again made little impression.

Two years later, however, Van Himst captained the team to third place in the European Championships and that marked the start of a successful run in that tournament. Belgium came through the qualifying round on four successive occasions and reached the final itself in 1980, losing 2-1 to West Germany in Rome. In the World Cup, Holland put paid to their hopes of reaching the finals in 1974 and 1978, but since then the Belgians have qualified every time. The national team has had just two coaches since 1976, Guy Thys until 1991 and, since then, Paul Van Himst. Consistency of selection has been vindicated by results, and rarely has a team been so closely moulded as that of Thys.

The side's greatest achievement came in the 1986 World Cup where they were eventually beaten in the semi-finals by two brilliant Maradona goals. For the association, reward for 25 years of progress finally came in 1995 when they were jointly awarded, with Holland, the staging of the 2000 European Championships.

BOSNIA-HERCEGOVINA

Bosnia is not a member of UEFA, nor is there much football played there at present, but the war-ravaged country has a proud football tradition from its time as part of the Yugoslav state. The capital Sarajevo had championship-winning sides in all three decades before the 1990s, whilst both Velez Mostar and Bora Banja Luka are former winners of the Yugoslav Cup.

There are Bosnians playing in leagues around Europe, the likes of Faruk Hadzibegic and Mehmed Bazdanovic, both regulars in the old Yugoslav side. However, the only football to be played in Sarajevo since independence is the occasional match against the United Nations peacekeepers.

BULGARIA

As was the case in most Eastern bloc countries, Bulgarian football benefited enormously from the communist takeover in 1944. Before then, the standard was very poor and the game not taken very seriously. There had been a league and a cup for clubs, and the national team took part regularly in the Balkan Cup, but it was not until after 1944 that the first grass pitch was laid.

In typical communist fashion, football was organised from top to bottom. New training techniques were introduced and players became 'professionals', if not in name then in outlook. Yet this approach was ultimately to lead to the stagnation of the game. 'The system' produced many fine footballers, and the Bulgars were almost impossible to beat in Sofia in the 1960s, but as the leading players cast their eyes to the fabulous sums being earned by their counterparts in the West, a decline set in that left the game once again among the weakest on the continent.

Popular legend has it that football first made an appearance in the country when a certain Georges de Regibus came to Bulgaria in 1894. He was a Swiss physical education teacher, and he used football as part of his warm-up routine at the boys' middle school in Varna. Indeed the Black Sea resort of Varna has always been regarded as the hotbed of Bulgarian football in these early years.

Political events in the Balkan region, however, held up the development of the game. After independence in 1908, Bulgaria became involved in the two Balkan Wars of 1912 and 1913. The area was referred to as the 'powder keg of Europe', so it was not surprising that sport did not have a very high priority. Indeed any sports club was officially frowned upon, so great credit must go to players like Stefan Naumov, a prominent figure in Sofia, for their perseverance. He organised the first inter-town match in 1912, a team from Plovdiv beating his Sofia side 4-0.

Sofia, due to its size and importance, began to take over from Varna as the leading force behind the game. In 1913, a group of the leading Sofia players, led by Dimiter Blagoyev and Boris Sharankov, formed Slavia, the oldest surviving club in the league, whilst in 1914 a group of teenage enthusiasts started Levski, a team that was destined to become one of the most successful and best supported clubs in the country. By the early 1920s, the political situation in the Balkans had stabilised, and the mounting popularity of the game meant that proper organisation was required. In 1923 the Bulgarian National Sports Federation was founded, of which the Football Federation formed a part, and the following year a successful application to FIFA was submitted.

By 1923 numerous clubs had sprung up around the country and disorganised regional leagues had already been formed. On 31 July 1921, ten clubs in Sofia created the Sofia sports league, whilst on the same day the Northern league was formed in Varna. After an abortive attempt at a national championship in 1924, a competition took place the following year involving the winners of the leagues from Sofia, Plovdiv, Varna, Burgas, Kyustendil and Vratsa. It was won by Vladislav Varna.

This formula continued until 1937 when for the first time a single league of the top 10 clubs was introduced. This lasted only 3 seasons, however, before the war forced a return to the regional leagues. In 1944 football was suspended altogether when Russian troops marched into the country, but that period from 1925 to 1943 was an era of great equality in terms of honours won in the league. No fewer than nine teams won the title, though all bar one of them came from either Sofia or Varna. In 1938 a knock-out competition was introduced. Formulated along the lines of the English cup in that any team could compete, it has, unlike those of many other countries, always been a very popular tournament. Five editions of it were played before it was suspended in 1943 and all five were won by teams from Sofia.

Bulgaria's baptism in international football can only be described as disastrous. They lost their first match 6-0 away to a powerful Austrian team, proceeded to lose their next six, and failed to win until their 15th game some six years later. Most of their games before 1943 were played against their neighbours in the Balkans and when they did venture out they were usually given sound thrashings by Europe's strongest nations. Results like the 13-0 defeat by Spain meant that the team were unwilling to take on the more advanced nations any more than necessary. Instead, the Balkan Cup proved a popular arena for games as Bulgaria won the tournament twice before the war.

The lure of the World Cup proved too strong to resist even though the Bulgarians knew they were one of the weakest sides. An application was made to take part in the second tournament in 1934 and they were drawn in a qualifying group that included Austria and Hungary, both major powers in Europe. The gulf in class was illustrated as the Bulgarians crashed twice to the Hungarians and once to the Austrians. In the 1938 competition their opponents were Czechoslovakia, the runners-up in 1934. The first match in Sofia was probably Bulgaria's finest pre-war result. They held the Czechs to a 1-1 draw but alas to no avail as they were humbled 6-0 in the return in Prague five months later. The most famous player of this era was Luibomir Angelov. Although he scored 25 goals Bulgaria's overall pre-war record was very poor.

After falling into the hands of the Nazis early on in the war, Bulgaria was 'liberated' by the Soviets in 1944. The high priority given by the Communist government to sport slowly transformed the football scene as large funds were made available for facilities and coaching. The championship was resumed in 1945, but in 1948 the whole system was reorganised. A single first division of 10 teams was established, though this has crept up over the years to 16. This formed the apex of a league pyramid that included every team in the country right down to the junior teams.

The other significant influence of state socialism could be seen in the actual composition of the clubs themselves. After the war each club came under the control of one official body or another. Each city had their representative for the Army, the Police, the railway workers and other industries, but Sofia clubs have always remained dominant. Levski, for a long time the team of the Interior Ministry, struggled to maintain a challenge to CSKA, the Army team, who, as they formed the basis of the national team, were given every advantage. In their first 15 years CSKA won the title a staggering 12 times. Indeed they have only once ever finished outside the top five, a disastrous 11th in 1964.

The CSKA side of the 1950s is regarded as the best club side the country has ever produced. It included such great names as Ivan Kolev, widely acclaimed as the best Bulgarian player of his time, as well as Stefan Bojkov, Manol Manolov, Georgy Naidenov and Dimiter Milanov. By the early 1960s CSKA were forced to rebuild, however, and the league briefly became an open affair. In five consecutive seasons five different teams triumphed, whilst in the space of seven years five different teams won the cup. By the end of the decade, however, events were back to normal with CSKA and Levski-Spartak passing the title back and forth between them.

Two events have shaped Bulgarian league football since then. First, after violent incidents in the 1985 Cup final between CSKA and Levski, both clubs were officially disbanded. They did resurface under different names, Sredets and Vitosha respectively, but are now back with their original names and continue to dominate the league. Of more lasting significance was the decision to let players move abroad, which has considerably weakened the league. There has, however, been a positive knock-on effect for the national side.

Since 1945 Bulgaria have taken great strides in international football. For a 15-year spell in the 1960s and 1970s, they were one of the top dozen countries in Europe. After the war, the Bulgarians were limited at first to matches against other communist countries - not until a World Cup match in 1957 against Norway did they leave the seclusion of Eastern Europe.

The Bulgarian approach was to build physically strong teams that could conform to a set pattern of play. As a result Bulgaria have always been tricky opponents but were thought to lack the flair and flexibility that could have made them a very successful team. Before the 1994 World Cup in America, they held one of the competition's most unwanted records: in five appearances in the finals, they failed to win a game in 16 attempts.

During the 1950s, the national team was in essence the CSKA team with Ivan Kolev, and Stefan Bojkov the captain, at the helm. Their results varied. Failure to qualify for the 1954 and 1958 World Cups was countered by a bronze medal at the Melbourne Olympics in 1956, but it was not until the end of the decade that the first real signs came that all the effort being afforded to football was beginning to pay off.

To the end of the 1994-1995 season

Bulgaria qualified for the World Cup finals for the first time when a 1-0 win over France in a play-off sent them to Chile in 1962. It was to be the first of four consecutive appearances in the finals, but each time was to prove a severe disappointment. Their poor showing in Chile was put down to inexperience of the big occasion, but matters did not improve four years later in the finals in England. Bad tactics and an injury to the inspirational Georgi Asparuhov, who had scored their only goal in Chile four years previously, sent the team home after three defeats.

The late 1960s probably saw the side at its peak. The prolific Hristo Bonev broke into the team in this period along with players such as Petar Jekov. The disappointment of an unfortunate defeat at the hands of Italy in the quarter-finals of the 1968 European Championships was assuaged by a silver medal at the Mexico Olympics later that summer, and qualification for their third successive World Cup finals in Mexico in 1970 was greeted with real optimism and hope. Indeed Bulgaria's performance this time was far more creditable and although they again failed to win a match and progress beyond the first round, their tally of 5 goals from 3 games was an improvement. If Asparuhov, again carrying an injury, had been fully fit, matters may have turned out differently, but at least Bulgaria had made their contribution to the general spirit in which this tournament was played.

In 1971, however, Asparuhov was killed in a car crash along with his international team-mate Nikola Kotkov. Although the team still managed to qualify for the next World Cup in West Germany thanks largely to the presence of Bonev, they left the finals this time without much credit, again failing to win a match.

The game in Bulgaria entered a long period of decline after 1974 and after a particularly poor qualifying campaign for the 1980 European Championships the entire governing body was sacked. Despite making it to the finals of the 1986 World Cup in Mexico, the Bulgarians again came away without a win, though bizarrely this did not prevent them from qualifying for the second round.

The fall of the Communist government may have left the league in Bulgaria weaker, but since the mass emigration of the top players in the 1990s the national team has been the main beneficiary. Players such as Hristo Stoichkov have found fame and fortune outside Bulgaria – a European Cup winner with Barcelona in 1992, he was voted European Footballer of the Year in 1994.

The Bulgarians qualified for USA '94 thanks to a goal by Emil Kostadinov in the last minute of their final qualifiying match against France, but after a 3-0 defeat in their opening game of the finals against Nigeria, it looked as if yet more disappointment was in store. Instead, victory over Greece in the next game finally broke their infamous sequence and superb displays followed as both Argentina and Germany were beaten on the way to the semi-final. There the Bulgarians finally bowed out to Italy, but they had finally laid their World Cup jinx to rest.

CROATIA

When Croatia took the field against Romania in December 1990, it was their first international for nearly 50 years. During the Second World War the country had existed as an independent state with the backing of the German government. For four years internationals were played, with mixed success, against the Axis powers and their occupied territories, notably Slovakia.

A league was also contested and Gradanski Zagreb, five times Yugoslav champions in the 1920s and 1930s, won three of the four titles. With the war over and Tito, himself a Croatian, leading the government in Belgrade, the country became part of Yugoslavia again.

More titles followed for Croatian clubs including Dinamo Zagreb, a club which had its origins in Gradanski. Until Red Star Belgrade won the European Cup in 1991, Dinamo were the only Yugoslav club to have won a European title. Finalists in the Fairs Cup in 1963, they eventually won the tournament in 1967. They were not, however, the most successful Croatian club in the Yugoslav league: that honour went to Hajduk Split, seven times champions after the war, nine times in all. Hajduk also won nine Yugoslav Cups, one more than Dinamo.

Many of the best players in the Yugoslav national team were Croats, so it was no surprise that independent Croatia should immediately be such a football power. The Yugoslav victory in the 1987 World Youth Cup owed much to the talents of Robert Jarni, Janko Jankovic, Zvonimir Boban, Davor Suker and Robert Prosinecki – all Croatians.

The country has managed to avoid the worst of the troubles that have beset the region since the break-up of Yugoslavia and in October 1992 Zagreb played host to Mexico in the first international to be played on Croatian soil since 1944. Club football has suffered from the exodus of top players such as Boban and Alen Boksic, a European Cup winner with Marseille in 1993 before joining Lazio, but Hajduk and Croatia Zagreb, the renamed Dinamo, continue to produce players of class.

CYPRUS

Until the expansion of UEFA in the early 1990s, Cyprus struggled to win international matches and only very rarely succeeded. But no longer! Victory against the Faroe Islands in June 1992 was the first by the national side in a competitive international for almost 20 years, and within two years they had achieved further wins over Greece, Malta and new members Georgia and Estonia.

Furthermore, their clubs have started to put together some good results in European competitions. In 1993/94 Apollon defeated the Hungarian side Vac FC in the first round of the UEFA Cup, then held mighty Inter to a 3-3 draw after losing only 1-0 in Milan. The Italians went on to win the cup.

Cyprus effectively operates as two separate countries. In 1974 Turkish troops invaded and occupied the north of the island, and inevitably the division had an effect on football as Greek clubs which found themselves on Turkish territory had to up and move south. Famagusta, now in the northern sector of the island, was home to two Greek clubs, Anorthosis and Nea Salamis. Both relocated to Larnaca.

The Greeks have always been the more football-oriented of the two communities, and as a British colony, football caught on easily amongst the locals. The Cyprus Football Association was formed in 1934, and a league as well as a cup competition was introduced the following year. In 1948 this association was affiliated to the FA in London and membership of FIFA was granted. An international was played against Israel the following year, but it was not until the 1962 World Cup qualifiers that another Cypriot team took the field.

To the end of the 1994-1995 season

Since Cyprus became a member of UEFA in 1962, they have regularly entered teams in competitions at both national and club level, but until very recently success in the European club competitions was as spectacularly absent as it was for the national side. Apoel, traditionally the strongest team on the island, were once on the receiving end of a 16-1 thrashing by Sporting from Portugal and have also conceded double figures to Dunfermline and Lierse SK.

Only one predominantly Turkish club, Chetin Kaya, ever achieved any success in the league or cup. But the northern state is not recognised by anyone outside Ankara and although an effort was made to join world football, FIFA would have nothing to do with it. To all intents and purposes, football lies dormant north of the green line.

Thankfully, given the bitterness which exists, only once has a Cypriot club been drawn against a side from Turkey. In 1987, Apoel beat HJK Helsinki and were drawn against Besiktas in the second round – and so promptly withdrew.

THE CZECH REPUBLIC

The Czech Republic is the heartland of the former state of Czechoslovakia and heads towards the next century with great hope. Its capital Prague has been at the centre of a great economic success story since the fall of Communism and the football federation will be hoping for a similar revival.

In 1993 came the introduction of a new Czech League and the first championship had familiar winners, Sparta Prague. However, it also saw the regeneration of a few names from the past. Slavia Prague, a club born in the days before Czechoslovakia even existed, have become a force again, whilst Viktoria Zizkov, champions in 1928, won the Czech Cup. At the same time the old Army team Dukla Prague, a club which had always received special patronage from the Communist rulers, went the other way. They were relegated in 1994 after winning just one game all season and losing in the Cup to a fifth division side.

The Czech league is not a new concept. Dating originally from 1896, it has been played in various forms over the years, depending on which territories came under the auspices of the governing body at the time. The Stredocesky League, a popular tournament in the early 1920s, was restricted to clubs around the former Bohemian capital Prague, whilst the Ceskomoravska League, played during the war, was open to all of Bohemia and Moravia, the regions which make up the present Czech Republic. It has not been unknown for the Stredocesky Cup to run alongside the Czech Cup, while after 1970 the Czechoslovakian Cup final took the form of a play-off between the winners of the Czech Cup and Slovak Cup.

Both Sparta and Slavia were formed in 1893 and they dominated football in Prague from the very start, Slavia winning three of the five Czech leagues played between 1896 and 1902. The Charity Cup in 1906 was the next major tournament to be launched and results confirmed the Sparta-Slavia axis as the dominant force in the capital, so that they were the only serious title contenders when the Czech League was launched in 1912 and the Stredocesky League in 1918. Both clubs also made their mark internationally, Slavia in particular scoring heavy wins in the early years of the century over First Vienna (11-0), Nuremburg (12-2), Bayern Munich (13-0) and Budapest Torna Club (12-0).

A Bohemian national side took to the field in 1903 against Hungary and over the next five years six further internationals were played, all against the same opponents apart from one game against England in 1908. Bohemia were due to enter the 1908 Olympics in London but withdrew at the last moment and played no more internationals until they entered the 1920 Games – as Czechoslovakia.

Czech sides were always the more dominant in the new Czechoslovakian league, the Slavia-Sparta hegemony continuing throughout the inter-war years. During the war Czech clubs again played in their own league but when forces were joined again afterwards, the decline of Slavia allowed Slovak clubs such as Slovan Bratislava and later Spartak Trnava to challenge Sparta.

The wheel has turned full circle and Czech football now looks set to be dominated by Sparta and Slavia again. It is hoped that the success of the country's economy will have a positive effect on the game and enable Sparta and Slavia to compete with the best in Europe.

THE FORMER CZECHOSLOVAKIA

In November 1993 Czechoslovakia quietly slipped into footballing history, a 0-0 draw in a World Cup qualifier in Brussels proving the last act of a once great footballing nation. Henceforth the Czech Republic and Slovakia would both play as independent states again.

Czechoslovakia was itself born as an independent state in 1918 but it was not until 1925 that a national league was set up catering for all three republics of Bohemia, Moravia and Slovakia. The national team entered the Olympic Games in 1920 and reached the first of the four major finals they have appeared in, but they lost 2-0 to the hosts, Belgium, and were not even awarded the silver medal as they walked off the field after half an hour, complaining about the bias of the referee.

Throughout the 1920s and 1930s, Czechoslovakia produced some fabulous players and sides. Sparta Prague won the first Mitropa Cup in 1927, a feat they repeated in 1935, whilst their city rivals Slavia were victorious in 1938. Both clubs dominated the league at home, winning 13 of the 14 championships played before the war. Success in the Mitropa Cup meant that both Slavia and Sparta could bring famous players, the likes of the Belgian Raymond Braine, to Prague.

In the 1934 World Cup the national side contained players such as Antonin Puc, the all-time leading goalscorer for Czechoslovakia, Frantisek Planicka, regarded as the finest goalkeeper of the pre-war era, and Oldrich Nejedly, another prolific goalscorer. They played some of the best football of the tournament but lost 2-1 to Italy in the final in Rome. The 1938 World Cup was not such a success as they were eliminated by Brazil after the infamous Battle of Bordeaux in the quarter-finals, Planicka breaking an arm and Nejedly a leg.

After the Second World War and the Communist takeover all clubs were incorporated into various government bodies such as the army and police and the immediate effect was to break the Sparta-Slavia stranglehold. Dukla Prague, the team of the army, and sides from Bratislava and other provincial towns began to make their presence felt. Slavia went into a decline from which they have only just recovered. Clubs such as Slovan Bratislava, Banik Ostrava, and Spartak Trnava all had successful spells in the league and cup. Slovan won the Cup Winners Cup in 1969, but it was the only European title ever won by a Czechslovakian club.

The final standings for Czechoslovakia 1925-1993

For a decade after the war it looked as if the national side had been permanently weakened. Poor performances in the 1954 and 1958 World Cups were followed, however, by an upturn in fortunes. Based now around the powerful Dukla team, Czechoslovakia finished third in the inaugural European Championship and followed this success by reaching the World Cup Final again in 1962. In that side was Josef Masopust, one of the most famous Czechoslovakian footballers of all time.

There were those who claimed that the post-war generation did not match up to their illustrious predecessors, and there was a grain of truth in this. Failure to qualify for the 1966 World Cup as well as defeat in the first round of the 1964 European Championship by East Germany lent credence to the idea that had it not been for Viliam Schroif, their goalkeeper who was in inspirational form up until the final in Chile, the team would not have got as far as they did.

The slide continued throughout the 1970s despite one heroic interlude. In the 1976 European Championship, England were beaten into second place in the qualifying group and the quarter-finals saw victory over the Soviet Union. Czechoslovakia were unfancied when they travelled to Yugoslavia for the final stages, but in the semi-finals they beat Holland 3-1 to qualify for their fourth major final. They now faced the world champions West Germany and the match was a classic, a 2-2 draw after extra-time. The championship was decided on penalty kicks and the Czechs prevailed, ultimately deserving of their title in what had proved to be an entertaining final tournament.

Once again the team's success owed much to outstanding goalkeeping and Ivo Viktor went on to win the European Footballer of the Year award, the only player from Czechoslovakia to do so. In defence Anton Ondrus was particularly strong whilst in midfield Antonin Panenka and Karol Dobias combined well. Zdenek Nehoda in attack was a prolific goalscorer, and finished his career only three short of Puc's record tally, at a time when goals were much harder to come by. Third place was achieved at the 1980 European Championships but although the team qualified for two more World Cups neither was a spectacular success.

The Velvet Revolution of 1989 which saw the Communists swept from power also signalled the end of Czechoslovakia as an entity. The Slovaks voted to become independent, and the 1992/93 domestic season was Czechoslovakia's last.

DENMARK

The Danes were among the very first continental nations to take up football, and of these early proponents of the game they were certainly the best. Yet before long they were left behind, firmly ensconced in the amateur tradition. Fortunately, a collection of fine players all come to prominence in the late 1970s and early 1980s and their success at international level forced change at home. Club football was reorganised in an attempt to give the clubs the same opportunity for success, and the recent exploits of the likes of Brondby and Odense suggest it is paying off.

Scandinavia was a popular location for tours by British sides at the turn of the century. Staevnet, a combination of the four main Copenhagen sides, KB, B93, Akademisk and Frem, were specially formed to take on these tourists and the experience gained launched Denmark to the forefront of the European game. KB Copenhagen, formed in 1876, are even older than most English and Scottish clubs, but although there were numerous clubs by the turn of the century, a league did not come into operation until 1913.

The 1908 and 1912 Olympics were a particular triumph for the Danish national side. As a fortress of the amateur game, their players came from unlikely backgrounds. Harald Bohr, who played in all three games at the 1908 Games in London, became a mathematician of international renown, whilst his brother Niels, who made one appearance for the national side, later won the Nobel prize for physics! In 1908, coached by Charlie Williams, the Manchester City goalkeeper, the Danes beat France 17-1 and 9-0 to qualify for the final. In the first of those games, Sophus Nielsen scored 10 goals, a record for an international that stands to this day. Against England in the final at White City, Denmark played very well and the hosts struggled to win 2-0.

Four years later in the final in Stockholm, the same two teams faced each other again. In the semi-finals, the Danes had disposed of their biggest rivals, Holland, with an easy victory and in the final they had their fair share of the play, eventually losing 4-2. These early Danish teams included Nils Middleboe, who joined Chelsea in 1913 and became one of their most famous players.

As professionalism was adopted in parts of Europe in the 1920s, the focus of football shifted towards Central and Southern Europe and away from Scandinavia. The decline in Denmark's performances in the inter-war period was startling, as even Norway caught up and for a while overtook them in terms of success on the field. Of the Scandinavian countries only Finland remained weaker, and even victory against them was no longer assured.

With a number of talented individuals such as Karl and John Hansen and Karl Praest, the Danes staged a mini-revival after the war and achieved third place at the 1948 Olympics. However, all three players were subsequently signed by Juventus, and a rule which kept foreign-based professionals out of the Danish national side meant that no lasting progress was made. Twelve years later, after Denmark had finished runners-up in the Rome Olympics, the same happened again. Club football as a result was not exactly vibrant. Copenhagen's hegemony was broken in the 1950s as the provincial clubs began to win honours, but the game was seen as little more than a pastime and attendances were poor.

The 1970s saw the beginnings of change, and the national side gave the lead. One player in particular, Allan Simonsen, seemed to set an example for others to follow.

Playing for Borussia Mönchengladbach and Barcelona, his profile was higher than any Dane before him. There followed a flood of players leaving Denmark for the clubs of Western Europe. The likes of Michael Laudrup, Preben Elkjaer-Larsen, John Sivebaek, Jesper Olsen, Jan Molby and Soren Lerby all left home to play professional football abroad.

With the rule barring these players from representing Denmark thrown out in 1976, the effect on the national team was not long in coming. In the 1984 European Championships, England were knocked out in the qualifying round, beaten 1-0 at Wembley. This Danish victory was all the more remarkable in that it represented one of only three competitive defeats that England had ever suffered at home.

To the end of the 1994-95 season

In the finals, the Danes won many admirers for their skilful and entertaining brand of football, as did their supporters who added much colour and humour to the event. Following a semi-final appearance in France where they lost on penalties to Spain, Denmark qualified for what remains their only World Cup finals appearance to date, the 1986 Mexico tournament. A stunning 6-1 victory over Uruguay in the first round saw the team being talked about as possible world champions. Once again, however, Spain put paid to their hopes as the Danes collapsed in the second round. With the original generation of players who had been part of this revolution now starting to retire, many thought that Denmark's heyday was over.

This has not happened, however, as talented players have continued to emerge. The national team reached the European Championship finals again in 1988, and although they failed to impress then, the best was yet to come. Beaten into second place by Yugoslavia in the qualifying round of the same competition four years later, the Danes found themselves drafted into the finals at the last minute when the Yugoslavs were expelled. There they progressed to the last four at the expense of England and France, defeated Holland on penalties to reach the final, and upset Germany 2-0 to become European champions.

It was an extraordinary achievement and a massive boost for the domestic game's professional Super League, introduced in 1991. Professionalism had been introduced in 1978 but never properly exploited until the new league's arrival. Results in European club competitions improved dramatically in the 1990s as Brondby reached the semi-finals of the UEFA Cup and such giants as Real Madrid and Bayern Munich fell victim to Danish clubs. Meanwhile the national team's success story continued when they won the 1995 Intercontinental Cup, beating Argentina in the final. The world is waiting to see just what the Danes are going to do next.

ENGLAND

The playing fields of Eton and the other major Public Schools of 19th-century England should have a treasured place in the hearts of the world, for out of these exclusive establishments came the embryonic versions of all the major codes of modern-day football. For many centuries, in different parts of the world, a haphazard and often violent form of 'Foote-balle' had been practised by the population at large, but the Public Schools were the first to adopt binding rules and mark out a definitive area of play.

The rules varied from school to school but in 1848, pupils at Cambridge University, in an attempt to unify these different methods of play, drew up the 'Cambridge Rules'. Based primarily on the dribbling game, these laws formed the basis of those adopted in 1863 by the newly formed Football Association. The historic meeting on 26 October that year marks the birth of Association Football proper. The handling code went its separate way, giving rise to the birth of rugby, and although various regions like Sheffield did not immediately adopt the new rules, the new association gradually became the pre-eminent body in England. Four events of tremendous significance happened before the turn of the century. In 1871 the Football Association launched the Challenge Cup. In 1872 the first international match was played, between England and Scotland. In 1885 professionalism was legalised, whilst in 1888 league football was introduced.

The Football Association Challenge Cup, or FA Cup as it is more commonly known, is the oldest and still the most famous football tournament played in the world. The 'little tin idol', as the Cup itself was called, was instrumental in the development of the game. It brought into focus the issue of professionalism by pitting the 'old schoolboy' amateur sides of the South against the rapidly forming 'works' sides of the industrial North. Football, though initially a pastime of the privileged elite, was fast becoming a major recreation in the drab industrial cities. Factory workers enjoyed both playing and watching the game as a diversion from the harsh realities of 19th-century life. The increasingly widespread practice of finishing work at lunchtime on a Saturday left the afternoon free, and many workers used the time to watch football, a tradition that survives to this day in England. By 1880 rumours were rife that many of these Northern sides were paying members of their teams, and as they became more successful in the Cup, the issue of professionalism was brought to a head.

In 1883 Blackburn Olympic beat Old Etonians 2-1 in the final and never again would the amateur sides of the South triumph. In 1884 having just drawn with Preston North End in the fourth round of the Cup, Upton Park protested that Preston were employing professionals. Major Sudell, the architect of the great Preston side of the late 1880s, openly admitted that this was the case but maintained that it was common practice amongst all the Northern clubs. Preston were disqualified, but a year later, realising that fighting the tide was futile, the Football Association legalised professionalism.

Professionalism, once established, then had a big influence on the next major development in the game, the formation of the Football League in 1888. The regular payment of players necessitated playing regular fixtures. As the Cup did not afford this, William McGregor of the Aston Villa club proposed, in a letter to interested parties, the arranging of home and away fixtures each season as occurred in cricket. The idea was adopted at a meeting in the Anderton Hotel in Fleet Street on 22 March 1888. All of the 12 clubs involved in the new league were from the North or the Midlands, and not until the 1930s were any teams from the South to feature prominently in either the Cup or the League. Football had found its roots, and they lay mainly in the North.

On Saturday 30 November 1872 at the West of Scotland cricket ground in Glasgow, England met Scotland in the first ever international football match played in the world. It would be another 30 years before any non-British sides took up the idea. By then the annual fixture was equal in importance to any other sporting fixture in the calendar and served as an excellent model for these countries to follow. It also became a means whereby professionals could play alongside their amateur colleagues. After the events of 1885 this was crucial in uniting the game and keeping the Football Association as the ultimate governing body in English football. The first professional to play for England was the Blackburn Rovers halfback James Forrest, against Scotland in 1885, but despite the growing strength of the professional game, amateurs continued to represent England well into the next century.

In 1879 Wales were added to the fixture list as were Ireland in 1882. In 1884 these fixtures were formalised into the British International Championship, and until 1923 this was the basis of England's international programme. It was not until 1908, when the side made a tour of central Europe, that teams from outside Britain were first encountered, although representative English sides had toured Germany in 1896 and 1899, and France in the early years of the 20th century, whilst numerous English club sides had made trips to all four corners of the world in an effort to spread the game. The British Championship however, remained at the pinnacle of world football.

Many fine club sides emerged in these early years, the first being the Wanderers. They won the Cup five times in the first seven years. Their major rivals, the Old Etonians, won twice and were the losing side on four occasions. A leading figure of this time was the redoubtable Lord Kinnaird who appeared in nine of the first twelve finals for both the Wanderers and Old Etonians. His five winners' medals remains a record and he later went on to become president of the Football Association. Two teams emerged to take the limelight away from these Southern amateur sides. First Blackburn Rovers, who themselves won the Cup five times between 1884 and 1891. James Forrest appeared in all five of their triumphs, thus equalling the feat of both Wollaston of the Wanderers and Lord Kinnaird.

Along with Blackburn, Preston reinforced the supremacy of the North. Often labelled 'the Invincibles', Preston revolutionised the game in England. Using the 2-3-5 formation, they recognised the need for a more scientific approach to their play. The team became the most feared in the land and in 1889 they did the coveted League and Cup 'double' without losing a game. Their star player was undoubtedly John Goodall, the outstanding centre-forward of his generation. Soon, however, other teams from the North began to make their presence felt, notably Aston Villa, Sunderland and Newcastle United. Until 1921 only one team from the South managed to win a trophy: Tottenham Hotspur won the Cup in 1901 as a Southern League side.

Before the First World War, many great players helped spread the popularity of the game to the extent that by 1914 it had become the national sport. Crowds of over 100000 had watched the Cup Final, whilst even in the South the professional teams of the Southern League gained in popularity. Chief among these great players, curiously, was an amateur, GO Smith. He played for the last great amateur side, the Corinthians, and won 20 caps for England at a time when only three internationals were played every season. Steve Bloomer of Derby County, Billy Bassett of West Brom, Ernest Needham of Sheffield United and Vivian Woodward, an amateur with Tottenham, also stand out as the great pre-war players, the latter leading England to two Olympic gold medals in 1908 and 1912. Woodward was also the star of England's first official foreign tour in 1908 and again the next year. He scored 15 goals in the seven matches against Austria, Hungary and Bohemia.

Along with Scotland, there can be no doubt that England were a class above the rest of the football world during this period. Huge victories over Ireland (13-2 in 1899), Austria (11-1 in 1908), France (15-0, 12-0, 11-0 and 10-1 between 1906 and 1910) and Germany (9-0 in 1909) confirm this fact, to the extent that the last two victories were achieved by the England amateur side as opposed to the full team containing the professionals. The rivalry with Scotland, however, was a different matter, with the honours evenly shared. The Scots played an enormous part in the development of the game in England. Most notably they were responsible for the adoption of the passing game, which gradually took over from the dribbling game as the norm. This happened due to the large numbers of Scots who came to play their football south of the border. Successful teams such as Sunderland in the 1890s relied heavily on their contribution as did teams like Preston. Even William McGregor, the father of the Football League, originally hailed from north of the border.

When football resumed after the break caused by the war, it seemed as though things were back to normal. England and the rest of the Home Unions were, however, beginning on a course of gradual isolation. The world was taking up football with a passion, and becoming rather good at it. The Football Association had joined FIFA in 1905, but had always adopted a rather paternal attitude towards it. They withdrew in 1920 because they refused to fraternise with their wartime adversaries, and having rejoined in 1924 they withdrew again in 1928 over the definition of the word 'amateur' in relation to the Olympic Games. This action meant that England could not compete in any of the first three World Cups which were played during the inter-war period. Even if they had been members of FIFA it is doubtful that would have deigned to compete anyway. Judging by the interest shown in the English newspapers at the time of these tournaments, most Englishmen cannot have even been aware that they were being played.

The consequences of this self-imposed 'splendid isolation' did not immediately become apparent. England's first defeat against foreign opposition did not come until they were beaten by Spain in 1929 in Madrid. Defeats by France in 1930, Hungary and Czechoslovakia in 1934, Austria and Belgium in 1936, Switzerland in 1938 and Yugoslavia in 1939, all away from home, did little to dent England's self-belief, but the cracks were beginning to appear. Even the 4-3 victory over the Austrian 'Wunderteam' at Chelsea in 1932 only disguised the fact that the Austrians were the better team. Most Englishmen assume that they would have won the three World Cups of the 1930s, but even Vittorio Pozzo, the Italian manager and a great admirer of English football, stated that away from England, the English would have been lucky to have reached the quarter-finals of either the 1934 or 1938 tournaments.

The English League, however, continued to be strong between the wars. It produced two sides of outstanding quality, Huddersfield Town in the 1920s and Arsenal in the 1930s. Both won the League three years in succession, and both had a common guiding force, Herbert Chapman. He was a revolutionary figure, the first modern-day manager. He had an astute tactical brain with which he devised methods of play and then bought players who would fit into this system. Along with Charlie Buchan, his skilful centre-forward at Arsenal, he introduced the 'third-back game' following the change in the offside law in 1925. To counter the increased number of goals being scored as a result of this change, he pulled the centre-half back into the role of a stopper as well as introducing a deep-lying centre-forward, both of whose roles would be to initiate effective counter attacks. Arsenal played this system to great effect, the key player being Alex James. It often seemed that Arsenal were under pressure for most of a match but a key pass from James, deep in defence, regularly brought goals on the counter. Arsenal always had an excellent forward line with players like Ted Drake, Cliff Bastin and David Jack, along with Buchan, playing for them in the 1930s. Their five League Championships and two Cup wins are testament to the skills of Herbert Chapman, though he did not live to see all of his team's triumphs.

During the Second World War, the game went on. It was thought to be a good diversion during troubled times, though none of the international or domestic results are counted as official. The interest shown in the game directly after the war has never been surpassed. Huge crowds turned out every week, but what they were witnessing was a decline that had set in before the war, especially with regard to the national side. Again, however, results disguised the true state of the game. A 4-0 win over the World Cup holders Italy in Turin in 1948 was hailed as a world-beating performance, as was the 10-0 victory over Portugal in Lisbon the previous year.

The 1950 World Cup in Brazil did little to bring the team down to earth. Defeats by America and Spain were dismissed as flukes and it was not until one famous Wednesday afternoon in November 1953 that the English team realised that tactically they were stale, the state of coaching in the country was poor and that technically players from elsewhere were superior to them. The 6-3 victory by Hungary that day, the first by a foreign team on English soil, had far-reaching repercussions. Slowly the English began to learn from the experience, to adapt foreign methods and styles to the English game. This defeat and those that followed in the 1954, 1958, and 1962 World Cups paved the way for their triumph in the 1966 competition, by forcing the English team to find out where the faults lay and what their strengths were.

England was not devoid of talent in these post-war years. Stanley Matthews seemed to get better with age and there were players such as Tom Finney of Preston, Billy Wright of Wolves and Nat Lofthouse of Bolton who were all excellent players. Stan Cullis, the Wolves manager, built a successful team based more on hard work and rudimentary tactics than on skill, but one which dominated the league in the 1950s and achieved notable victories in friendly matches against Honved and Spartak Moscow. One team, however, paved the way for the English revival. Matt Busby, a former Scottish international, created the Manchester United legend. In his time at the club he moulded together four excellent sides, the greatest of which was possibly the 'Busby Babes' team. Spearheaded by Duncan Edwards, the boy genius, they seemed destined to become as fine a team as the famous Real Madrid who were dominating the European Cup in the latter half of the 1950s. Tragically, however, the team was wiped out by an air crash at Munich airport on their way back to England from a European Cup tie in February 1958. Duncan Edwards, Roger Byrne and Tommy Taylor, all established England internationals, perished in the disaster. One survivor who formed the link with the next great Manchester United team was Bobby Charlton. He also played a crucial role in England's re-emergence as a world power in the 1960s, playing alongside the likes of Jimmy Greaves, Gordon Banks, Bobby Moore and Martin Peters. Charlton and the rest of the England team, ably managed by the dour Alf Ramsey, won the World Cup at home in 1966.

England's victory formed the basis from which the game, especially at club level, developed. Manchester United's victory in the 1968 European Cup was not the first win by an English club in a European competition - Tottenham and West Ham had won the Cup Winners Cup in 1963 and 1965 respectively - but it fired a warning shot that the game in England was in a healthy state and that the World Cup victory was no fluke. For the next 17 years, clubs from England dominated the European scene. From 1977 until 1984 three different English teams won the European Cup in seven of the eight seasons. The UEFA Cup was won six years in succession, by five different clubs, between 1968 and 1974. The strength in depth of the Football League could not be matched by any other European nation. A very English style of game had emerged that was quick and penetrative and best epitomised by first Leeds United and then Liverpool. Between them they won nine European finals and appeared in 13.

This astounding success can partially be traced back to 1963, when the maximum wage limit imposed on English players was removed. It allowed the top clubs to sign and pay handsomely all the top players in the country. A league of superclubs began to emerge. Up until 1963 the championship and the Cup had been open affairs, and anybody had a chance to win. This allowed small clubs like Burnley to win the League as late as 1960. But by the late 1960s Liverpool, Everton, Manchester United, Arsenal, Leeds and Tottenham came to dominate the domestic scene. By the end of the 1980s Liverpool had become pre-eminent. A single statistic sums up their stunning success. Between 1973 and 1991 they finished outside of the top two in the league on only one occasion, a miserable fifth in 1980. During that time they won the championship an incredible 10 times.

Achievement at club level did not, however, translate itself into success at international level. Third place in the European Championship in 1968 and fourth place in the 1990 World Cup have been the only achievements of note since the World Cup victory in 1966. An unlucky defeat in the quarter-finals of the 1970 World Cup in Mexico, with what many rate as a better team than the 1966 side, proved to be the beginning of a traumatic time for the national side as England failed to qualify for both the 1974 and 1978 World Cup Finals. The irony of the situation was that England's side in the 1970s, though not world beaters, was never a bad one. Players such as Colin Bell, Tony Currie, Mike Channon and Kevin Keegan deserved to have their talents displayed on a World Cup stage.

By the 1980s the team had settled down and were unlucky not to progress further than they did in the 1982 World Cup, as was the case in 1986 when Maradona's 'Hand of God' sealed their fate in the quarter-finals. However, the events at the Heysel stadium in Brussels during the 1985 European Cup final between Liverpool and Juventus, where 39 Italians fans died as a result of hooliganism, left English clubs banned from European competition and isolated, and their consequent lack of European experience inevitably had its effect on the national side as the disastrous performance in the finals of the 1988 European Championship showed. Indeed the game as a whole was seriously tarnished by a series of tragedies and continued hooliganism. In May 1985, 45 people lost their lives in a fire at Bradford City Football Club, whilst in April 1989 95 fans were crushed at Hillsborough in Sheffield at the FA Cup semi-final between Liverpool and Nottingham Forest.

Thankfully those grim events proved to be a watershed for the game in England. Hooliganism was gradually brought under control within stadiums with the help of security cameras and England has progressed from having some of the most rundown stadia in Europe to being able now to count its grounds among the best. With the award of the 1996 European Championships, the development of the stadia has been taken a stage further.

To the end of the 1994-1995 season

Likewise after six or seven years in the doldrums, English club football is flourishing again with large amounts of money from television, ever-increasing attendances and a fierce competitive spirit in the new Premier League, which has seen the re-emergence of teams such as Manchester United, Arsenal, Leeds United, Sheffield Wednesday, Aston Villa and especially Blackburn Rovers. Funded by steel baron Jack Walker and with a brand new multi-million pound stadium, Blackburn have set a new standard for top players' wages and others have had to follow. Success is also starting to return at European level with victories in the Cup Winners Cup by Manchester United and Arsenal.

ESTONIA

Estonia, along with their Baltic neighbours Lithuania and Latvia, enjoyed a brief period of independence in the inter-war years, and in that time they started a league and played international matches.

Shuffled backwards and forwards between Poland, Sweden, Germany, Denmark and Russia, the Estonian people, when finally given independence in 1918, celebrated by forming a national football association. A league was started and international fixtures arranged, although games were almost entirely confined to the Scandinavian area. There was, however, a brief visit to Paris for the 1924 Olympic Games, where they lost 1-0 to the United States in the first round.

Despite being the smallest of the three Baltic states, Estonia were the most prolific and successful. Friendly matches were played, with some success, against Finland, and with less success against Sweden, Poland, the Soviet Union, Norway, Turkey, the Republic of Ireland, Germany and Hungary. The mainstays of their fixture list, however, were their Baltic neighbours Lithuania and Latvia, both in friendly games and in the Baltic Cup, a competition Estonia won on three occasions in the 1930s.

Absorption into the Soviet Union in 1939 effectively killed football in the country, and the newly independent

Estonia emerged in the 1990s as the weakest of the Baltic states. A league of sorts carried on throughout the Soviet years, but the clubs bore little resemblance to those of the pre-war period. As none of the teams from Estonia made it to the higher echelons of the Soviet league system, the winners of the Estonian regional league were the de facto champions of Estonia. Sport Tallinn were the only Estonian entrants into the short-lived Baltic League in 1990 before the regional league took on the role of a national league in the wake of independence. Two of the most succesful teams of the Soviet era, Dünamo and Norma Tallinn, were prominent in the new league, the latter winning the first two recognised Estonian championships. They might have made it three in a row in 1994 but for a bizarre incident.

Three clubs entered the final week of the championship level on points, Norma, Tevalte and Flora Tallinn. The first two clubs are strongholds of the huge Russian community in Estonia, whilst Flora are the team of the Estonians. In a move seen by many as pure favouritism, the federation dissolved Tevalte for alleged match-fixing and corruption, a charge which was never proved. Both Norma and Flora won their last games and had to play-off for the title. Norma, in support of Tevalte, deliberately fielded their reserve team and lost 5-2 as a result. Tevalte, who earlier in the season had beaten Kalev Sillamae 24-0 in a league match, appealed to FIFA and were reinstated in the league for the 1995-96 season.

The episode did not bode well for the future of Estonian football. Many ethnic Russians who have lived in Estonia all their lives have been labelled as foreigners by the federation, and Flora players form the basis of the national side. Their first outing in the World Cup since 1938 was hardly impressive and the first three years of internationals since independence saw just two wins in 31 outings, the only victories coming against Lithuania and Liechtenstein.

FAEROE ISLANDS

Geographically the Faeroe Islands could hardly be more remote from Europe, but they made quite an entrance in September 1990. Other 'minnows' such as Cyprus, Malta and Luxembourg had chalked up only a handful wins between them in years of international competition, yet the Faeroes, playing their first competitive game, won it. Austria were their victims, in the biggest shock the European Championships had ever seen, and they did not even enjoy home advantage, the game taking place in neutral Sweden.

The goalkeeper Knudsen, playing throughout the game in a bobble hat, became an instant hero, as did Nielsen, scorer of the winning goal. This result was followed up by an equally impressive draw away to Northern Ireland in Belfast, and the Faeroe Islanders finished the group with three completely unexpected points.

A league was started in the Faeroe Islands in 1942 and a cup competition has been played since 1967, but it was not until 1993 that any of the clubs took part in the European competitions. So far there has been no giant-killing to match that of the national team.

The Faeroes' first international match was actually played as long ago as 1930, with Iceland, the Shetland Islands, the Orkneys and Greenland having since contributed to one of the most bizarre fixture lists in world football, based on competitions such as the North Atlantic Cup and the Island Games.

A new pitch meeting UEFA standards has been laid in Tórshavn, and so the islanders can now look forward to some of the best players in the world visiting their shores.

FINLAND

Football is not the national sport in Finland, and trails in popularity well behind the likes of skiing, ski-jumping, and ice hockey. Finnish athletes such as Lasse Viren, the world's best long-distance runner in the 1970s, have always received far more attention than footballers. Consequently, football is not up to much in the land of lakes, and does not look as though it ever will be.

The football association, formed in 1907, instigated a league in the following year, but this was based almost exclusively around Helsinki, the distances between towns being too great to allow the participation of provincial teams until later on.

In the international field Finland did not venture far either. Except for a tour to Austria, Hungary and Germany in 1923, the national side rarely left northern Europe and Scandinavia until after the Second World War. In 1912 Finland entered the Stockholm Olympic Games and reached the semi-finals, beating Italy and what was Tsarist Russia on the way. In the semis, however, they were drawn against England and lost, as they did in the bronze medal play-off match against Holland.

The achievements in Stockholm proved to be a false dawn and even high-scoring victories over the Baltic states could not disguise the weakness of the game. On five occasions since, the Finns have been on the receiving end of a double-figure defeat.

The Scandinavian Championship provided the Finns' staple diet of international games until well into the 1970s when World Cup and European Championship commitments forced its abandonment, and apart from the 1960-63 edition which they rather surprisingly won, Finland were accustomed to finishing last on most occasions. Playing football only in the summer months does not make playing fixtures against those countries who play on a winter timetable very easy, although tours abroad in the early months of the year are now common practice.

Finnish clubs have been involved in the European competitions from the earliest years and there have been some suprising successes, especially from the provincial clubs, who after the war began to make their presence felt both in the league and cup. In 1986, Kuusysi Lahti reached the quarter-finals of the European Cup with victories over Sarajevo and Zenit Leningrad and only lost to Steaua Bucharest, the eventual winners, by the odd goal.

To the end of the 1994 season plus 1995 Cup

More and more, however, the best Finnish players are moving abroad, following in the footsteps of Juhani Peltonen who spent a couple of seasons in the 1960s in Germany with Hamburg. Mika-Matti Paatelainen has spent many successful seasons in British club football whilst Ajax believe they have unearthed the best Finnish footballer of all time in Jari Litmanen.

The national side look increasingly capable of causing an upset or two, and in the 1980 European Championships were only one point off qualifying for the final tournament, finishing above the Soviet Union but behind Greece. Such exploits are what the Finns have come rely on for their entertainment, but they would still rather see their ice hockey heroes or their rally drivers in action than watch their local football side every week.

FRANCE

France is a footballing enigma. Along with England, Italy, Germany, and Spain, Europe's other dominant countries, the French have the capability to become a world power, but so far they have not realised that potential. This has been particularly true at club level where low attendances and general apathy have left France trailing behind the likes of Sweden in the European club competitions.

The national side have had their moments, however. They finished in third place in the 1958 World Cup, and in the 1980s they produced one of the most exciting teams Europe has ever seen, peaking with a victory in the 1984 European Championship.

If the English were responsible for inventing modern football and bringing it to the world, we have the French to thank for organising it and creating both the World Cup and European Championship. It is somewhat surprising, therefore, that the prime movers behind the formation of both FIFA and UEFA should have produced nothing but chaos in the organisation of the game at home. No fewer than five different bodies vied for control of the game before the present federation was founded in 1918.

In France, rugby was by far the more popular game at the turn of the century and football clubs were often offshoots of rugby clubs. The oldest, Le Havre Athletic Club, was an example of this. It was founded in 1872, but it was not until 1892 that a football section was formed. Up until that point, only rugby was played. Racing Club de France were another such club. Formed in 1882, they remain the standard bearers of French rugby, but it was not until 1932 that they formed a professional football section, Racing Club de Paris, and became involved in the round-ball game. White Rovers, Gordon and Club Francais, the first clubs devoted entirely to football, were founded in 1892.

The north of France was a popular venue for tours by English teams before the turn of the century and it was here that the game was played most, but football (and rugby) soon spread throughout the country. Various leagues were formed by the different bodies who claimed responsibility for the game, but the first proper competition, the French Cup, was not launched until 1918 with the formation of the Federation Francaise de Football. Open to teams from the whole of France, the competition proved a huge success. Although attempts were made to form a national league in the late 1920s, it was not until the FFF sanctioned professionalism in 1932 that a proper league structure was set up.

France had more success in organising a national side in the early years. Many unofficial games had already taken place against sides from England, Belgium and Holland by the time of the first official match, against Belgium in Brussels in 1904. Four years later France entered the London Olympic Games only to be resoundingly thrashed 17-1 by Denmark. The turmoil in club football obviously did not help matters, but even after the war results did not improve. A new low was reached in 1927 when the national side lost 13-1 to Hungary in Budapest and all three pre-war World Cups brought disappointment for the French, not least in 1938 when they were chosen to host the event but made little impact.

The first signs of real progress in French football came after the war with the emergence of Stade de Reims, an outstanding team who boasted names like Albert Batteux, who in 1950 became their manager, Roger Marché, Robert Jonquet, Roger Piantoni, Jean Vincent, Raymond Kopa and Just Fontaine. Twice they lost to Real Madrid in the final of the European Cup, but these players also formed the basis for the national side that played so well to finish third in the 1958 World Cup.

However, this success was not built on and the game went into decline. France qualified for only one of the next four World Cups, and after reaching the semi-finals of the first European Championships in 1960 made little impression either in this tournament or the European club competitions. Saint-Étienne did their best to halt the decline, reaching the European Cup final in 1976, but not until the following decade was it really reversed.

Michel Platini had emerged in the late 1970s as the greatest player in French history and one of the best in the world. He soon left for the Italian league and an illustrious career with Juventus so the French championship did not see much of the benefit; but the national side did. At the 1978 World Cup, had they not been grouped with Argentina and Italy, who won the tournament and came fourth respectively, France would undoubtedly have progressed to the second phase. Four years later, the side was reaching maturity, with the midfield of Jean Tigana, Alain Giresse, Bernard Genghini and Platini being especially gifted. They should have beaten West Germany in the semi-final after leading 3-1 in extra-time, but in the penalty shoot-out that followed, poor Maxime Bossis fired his kick at Schumacher and France were out.

Two years later in the European Championships, justice was done as the national team won their first and only major honour. Admittedly they were playing at home, but the French at that time were without question the best side in Europe, and for Platini the tournament was a personal triumph that elevated his reputation to the level of players like Pele, Maradona, Beckenbauer and Cruyff. He scored nine goals in the five games that ultimately saw France beat Spain 2-0 in the final at Parc des Princes. In the same year he won the second of three European Footballer of the Year titles, the first of two World Footballer of the Year awards, and the Italian league and Cup Winners Cup with Juventus.

The 1986 World Cup in Mexico saw the French reach the semi-finals again, and once more they were undone by the Germans at the crucial stage, having already knocked out the holders Italy and many people's favourites Brazil. But failure to qualify for the 1988 European Championship finals and the 1990 World Cup seemed to signal another decline in French fortunes. The backbone of the 1980s team had gone and not been adequately replaced. For once, however, there was encouragement from the clubs both at home and in Europe.

To the end of the 1994-95 season

Transformed by the money and power of Bernard Tapie, Olympique Marseille won five consecutive league titles and, more important, became the first French side to win a European trophy. After losing on penalties to Red Star Belgrade in the 1991 European Cup final, they came back to win the tournament in 1993, upsetting the favourites Milan 1-0 in Munich. With Paris Saint-Germain finally giving Paris a club to be proud of, things had never been better in the league, while new players like Eric Cantona, Jean-Pierre Papin and Marcel Desailly were giving the national side renewed hope too. Under Platini, they qualified for the finals of the 1992 European Championships without dropping a point, the first team ever to do so. French football, it seemed, had arrived.

But things were about to go disastrously wrong. The national side's performances proved a false dawn and their failure in the finals in Sweden prompted Platini to resign. There was another setback in 1993/94 when France failed to qualify for the World Cup finals in America, while at the same time one of Europe's biggest bribery scandals was breaking over Marseille. It transpired that when OM played Valenciennes the week before the 1993 European Cup final, in a match which sealed another league championship for them, their opponents were paid to take things easy. Jacques Glassman blew the whistle on the whole 'affaire', as it became known, and his colleagues Jorge Burruchaga and Christophe Robert admitted to receiving money from Marseille's Jean-Jacques Eydelie. All received worldwide bans. Marseille were relegated, stripped of their 1993 title and forced to sell off their best players. Above all, they lost the patronage of Tapie, who was subsequently jailed. It was a sorry end to what had promised to be a proud era in French club football.

GEORGIA

The civil war in Georgia may have lost much of its ferocity since Abkhazia seceded from the new Republic, but the country's troubles are by no means over. Economic hardship and the threat that the civil war might erupt again at any time means that there has been little development since independence from the Soviet Union in 1991.

Georgia does, however, have a proud football tradition almost entirely as a result of the exploits of Dynamo Tbilisi. When they entered the European Cup as Georgia's representatives for the first time in 1994, it was Dynamo's eleventh European campaign. In 1981 they became the most easterly side to win a European club trophy when they beat Carl-Zeiss Jena in the final of the Cup Winners Cup. On the way they had beaten West Ham United and Feyenoord, while the previous season they had claimed their most famous ever scalp when they knocked out Liverpool in the first round of the European Cup.

Dynamo first won the Soviet championship in 1964, although they had been runners-up as early as 1939. Their second championship came in 1978 when they produced one of the all-time great Soviet club sides containing the likes of Alexander Chivadze, David Kipiani, Ramaz Shengalia and Tengiz Sulakvelidze, all Soviet internationals. Twice the Soviet Cup was won and Dynamo stood as the sixth most successful Soviet club of all time when the domestic competitions were finally wound up in 1993.

By then Dynamo were no longer involved. Georgia had been one of the leading forces behind the break-up of the Soviet Union and in 1990, a year before independence, formed its own league. Not surprisingly Dynamo, known for a time as Iberiya, won all of the first five championships played, but their return to Europe was marred by scandal. They were expelled from the European Cup after attempting to bribe the referee in their home tie against Linfield.

The national side made their bow, under the leadership of Chivadze, in 1994 at the Rothmans tournament in Malta. Results were mixed but a 5-0 drubbing of Wales in a European Championship qualifier in Tbilisi made the rest of Europe take note.

GERMANY

It would be hard to find a more enduring force in world football than Germany. Only once, when they have entered, have the Germans failed to qualify for the finals of the World Cup or European Championship. That was in 1968 when they finished second in their group behind Yugoslavia. Indeed on only one other occasion have they failed to top their qualifying group – and they more than made up for that, in the 1990 World Cup, by winning the trophy in the end.

One of a select group of six countries that have won football's world championship, until 1994 the Germans had the best overall record with three wins and three runners-up spots. Such is the level of expectation that it was considered a national disaster when they were beaten by Bulgaria in the quarter-finals in America.

By the turn of the century football had been played in Germany for over 20 years and the majority of today's major clubs had been formed by then. In 1875 Oxford University made a tour of Germany, the first by a British side abroad, but football was sometimes given a hostile reception. As was common in East Germany in the second half of the 20th century, the emphasis was often on individual sports, especially in the gymnastic associations or 'Turner' as they were known. The Turner were ultra-nationalistic bodies and in Bavaria they managed to get football banned until 1913, but this did not stop the growth of the game.

The first club devoted entirely to football was SC Germania Hamburg, formed in 1887. As in France, some clubs like TSV 1860 Munich were already in existence but did not start football sections until later. Hamburg, as the major port in the country, was the first centre of football, but the game soon spread to the other regions and Berlin especially became dominant. In 1896, in the first inter-city match, they beat Hamburg 13-0.

In 1898 regional leagues were set up in Southern Germany and Berlin, and to help create an organised structure the Deutscher Fussball-Bund was formed in 1900. Two years later it was decided to invite the winners of the regional leagues to take part in an end of season play-off to determine the national champions. This system remained in place until 1963, when rather belatedly the West Germans became the last European country to institute a single national league.

Prime movers behind the growth of football in Germany were Ferdinand Hueppe, the first president of the DFB, Konrad Koch, a teacher who drew up the first rules in German in 1876, and Walter Bensemann, another teacher who founded numerous clubs around the country including Kicker (later Eintracht) Frankfurt. He also founded Germany's major football newspaper Kicker in 1920.

It was Bensemann, too, who was behind the visit of the English amateur team to Germany in 1899 and the return visit in 1901, but it was not until 1908 that a proper national side was instituted and an official international played against Switzerland in Basle. The record leading up to the First World War was not very impressive with only six wins in 30 games. One game was remarkable, however: in the consolation tournament at the 1912 Stockholm Olympic Games, the Germans defeated Tsarist Russia 16-0 and Gottfried Fuchs scored 10 of the goals.

The inter-war period did not see an immediate rise in German fortunes and there was a surprising reluctance to join in with the main stream of European football, even allowing for Britain's opposition to Germany remaining a member of FIFA. It would have made sense for the Germans to have entered the International Cup or for the clubs to have joined in the Mitropa Cup. The two great club sides from this era, Schalke 04 and I.FC Nürnberg, would probably have been a match for the leading Austrian, Czech, Italian and Hungarian sides.

After Hitler came to power results for the national team began to improve dramatically, though it can be seen from the records that weaker teams were played to bolster the record. The 1934 World Cup was something of a triumph, with Germany winning a third place play-off against the 'Wunderteam' of the Austrians, but both the 1936 Olympic Games and the 1938 World Cup were a disaster as Germany were beaten by supposedly inferior opponents. In 1938 they failed to beat Switzerland despite having the pick of Austria's best players, who after the 'Anchluss' were now eligible to play for the fatherland.

The outbreak of war did not stop internationals being played. As the Germans conquered more and more of Europe, it was common for games to be played against both these countries and those that remained neutral. The aftermath of the war, however, brought about great change, not least in that there were now two Germanys. With Germany having been thrown out of FIFA in 1946, football all but ceased in the territory held by the Americans, British and French, which became known as West Germany, as it did in the Eastern sector held by the Soviet Union.

In 1948 the Deutscher Fussball-Verband der DDR (East Germany) was formed and a national championship was organised in the East. The East had never been very powerful in pre-war football and teams from that area had won only five championships, two of those in the war years. The pattern continued throughout the GDR's existence as a separate nation. Never did East Germany's footballers match the achievements of its athletes and swimmers, either at club or international level.

Their first international was played in 1952 against Poland and the 1958 World Cup was the first official competition entered by East Germany. Many countries were unhappy about the presence of the GDR in FIFA, however, and it was not until 1963 that a friendly game was played against a major Western power, with the visit of England to Leipzig.

During their 45-year history, the East Germans built up a phenomenal reputation in the sports field, but football never benefited from their emphasis on sporting achievement and in many ways suffered because of it. Not only were gifted athletes often syphoned off into other sports, but more important, the level of official interference in the clubs reached ludicrous proportions.

As in all Eastern bloc countries, football teams in the GDR were part of government institutions, and as none of them dated to pre-1945 there was very little identification with the supporters. Teams frequently changed their names and sometimes even moved towns. Dynamo Berlin in particular came to represent the worst side of East German football. As the team of the Stasi secret police, they were universally disliked but managed to 'win' 10 league championships in a row in the 1970s and 1980s. Derided as the 'offside champions' due to the number of opponents' goals that were mysteriously disallowed for that offence, even their players on occasions were known to be acutely embarrassed by events on the field.

The national side did see some success. They qualified for the 1974 World Cup finals in neighbouring West Germany, and as luck would have it, were drawn in the same group as their western counterparts. Jurgen Sparwasser's goal has gone down in history as the winner in the only game ever played between the two countries and East Germany won the group. In the second round, however, they were no match for the Dutch or the Brazilians who ended any hopes they may have had of reaching the final.

Two years later, in the Montreal Olympics, they won the gold medal, but by this time the Olympic football tournament had lost much of its credibility. A runners-up spot four years later did nothing to reverse the deteriorating image of East German football, and it was with little regret that with reunification in 1990 the East German association was disbanded, as was the national side and the league structure. The state that it was in was summed up by the award of just two places to East German clubs in the unified Bundesliga – and many felt that even that was too generous.

To the end of the 1990-1991 season, the last in the history of East Germany

As East Germany excelled at the individual sports, what became known as West Germany excelled in team sports and in particular at football. They were readmitted to FIFA in 1950, and four years later were world champions. Relying on a few players from the pre-war era and managed by Sepp Herberger, West Germany entered the 1954 World Cup in Switzerland and pulled off one of the biggest shocks ever.

The Hungarian side of 1954 was the best the world had seen, and many would argue that it has not been bettered since, and yet the Germans managed to beat them in the World Cup final, inflicting on the Hungarians their only defeat in six years. Not only did they beat Hungary, they also disposed of the fancied Austrians and Yugoslavia. The hero of the team was Helmut Rahn, but their success was more down to teamwork and the presence of the Walter brothers, along with Morlock and the inspirational Turek in goal.

From 1954 the Germans did not look back. A comprehensive coaching network was set up throughout the country and the flow of excellent footballers has continued unabated. Semi-finalists in 1958 and quarter-finalists in the 1962 World Cup, they reached the final again in 1966, but this time lost controversially to the hosts, England, at Wembley. Along with Rahn, the most famous players of this era were Uwe Seeler, Hans Schäfer, Helmut Haller, Hans Tilkowski, and Karl-Heinz Schnellinger.

As their fortunes rose on the pitch, it became evident that the league structure of the German game was becoming out of date, and so in 1963 a new single national league was created along with a second division, instead of the regional leagues which were relegated to the status of third division. Just as importantly, full-time professionalism was introduced, remarkably for the first time in the history of German football. Until 1963, most players had played on a semi-professional basis.

This was the spur that the game needed and by the late 1960s one team in particular was showing the way forward. Bayern Munich won the Bundesliga in 1969 with a team of players that have since become household names. They have dominated club football since and formed the basis of the national side that was without question the dominant force in world football in the 1970s. In goal Sepp Maier has never been equalled, although the defence in front of him consisting of Schwarzenbeck, Beckenbauer and Breitner would have made any goalkeeper look good. Franz Beckenbauer, in particular, was regarded, along with Johan Cruyff, as the heir apparent to the title left vacant by Pele as the world's greatest player. His concept of an attacking sweeper or libero was a major tactical innovation.

It was not just in defence and midfield that Bayern and West Germany were blessed with gifted players. Along with Pele and Puskás, there has never been a more prolific goalscorer than Gerd Müller. His 68 goals in just 62 international matches was an extraordinary achievement that will take some beating. Also scoring goals for Bayern and Germany was Uli Hoeness. The other dominant club during the 1970s, Borussia Mönchengladbach, also contributed their share of players with the likes of Berti Vogts, Rainer Bonhof, Herbert Wimmer, Uli Stielike, Jupp Heynckes and Gunter Netzer.

In 1972 West Germany became European champions for the first time and only surrendered their title to Czechoslovakia four years later after a penalty shoot-out in the final. In between they had become world champions for a second time when they won the 1974 World Cup at home. Beckenbauer captained the side and by the time of his international retirement in 1977 he had become the first German to win 100 caps. Der Kaiser, as he was known, also led Bayern to three consecutive European Cup wins in the 1970s, a decade which brought two UEFA Cup wins for Borussia Mönchengladbach and a Cup Winners Cup title for Hamburg. The Germans, it seemed, could do no wrong.

They started the 1980s in style as well, with an all-German UEFA Cup final won by Eintracht Frankfurt and a second European Championship for the national team. But with the Bayern/Borussia axis broken, club success in Europe became harder to come by. Hamburg's win in the 1983 European Cup remains the last in that competition by a German side, and since then only Bayer Leverkusen and Werder Bremen have brought home a European title, the 1988 UEFA Cup and 1992 Cup Winners Cup respectively. For the first time, Germany's top players began to play their club football outside the Bundesliga, first in Spain and then in Italy's Serie A.

Despite reaching the World Cup final in 1982 and 1986, the national team was widely perceived as having lost much of its flair, and indeed on both occasions nobody was quite sure how they had managed to progress so far. The famous German 'tournament mentality' seemed to be their greatest weapon. Poor showings in both the 1984 and 1988 European Championships, the latter on home soil, brought more disappointment, but the 1990 World Cup in Italy was a different affair. Led by Lothar Matthäus, Germany's most capped player of all time, the team were breathtaking in the early rounds and although they rather lost their way in the latter stages, they were nonetheless worthy champions. Beckenbauer became the first man to win the World Cup both as a captain and as coach.

To the end of the 1994-1995 season

The backbone of that side was the trio of Matthäus, Andreas Brehme and Jürgen Klinsmann, all of whom played in Milan for Inter. After the World Cup, German players were in even greater demand in Italy and one after another they left the Bundesliga. Not since the great Arminia Bielefeld bribery scandal of 1972 had the league been under such threat, but gradually the 'player drain' was reversed as money began to pour into the domestic game from television and sponsorship. The 1990 World Cup had revitalised the German public's interest in football and since then attendances have risen steadily to a point where they are now on average the highest in Europe, helped by the fact that the championship is more competitive now that Bayern's stranglehold has been broken. European trophies remain elusive, but Germany remains the perfect model of how to run football.

GREECE

The history of Greek football is a curious affair. Greece is amongst the most passionate of footballing nations, yet success for the national team has been non-existent. The clubs spend large amounts of money on foreign players, yet have nothing to show for it. So far, qualification for the 1980 European Championship and 1994 World Cup finals are the only successes of note.

Civil war and political instability in the first half of the 20th century certainly did not help the situation and it was not until 1926 that the football association was formed. A league championship was started two years later, based on clubs from Athens and Salonica, but not until 1960 was there a single national league. Instead, play-offs between various league winners were organised to determine the national champions in what was surely one of Europe's most complicated league structures.

Steeped in the history of the Olympic Games, Greek clubs reflected this heritage, not only through names of clubs like Olympiakos but also in their adherence to the amateur ethic. Full-time professionalism was introduced as late as 1979. The giants of the club game, Panathinaikos and AEK from Athens, Olympiakos from Piraeus, and Aris and PAOK from Salonica are all now very much professional outfits, but they, like the game in Greece generally, have been seriously affected by hooliganism. Until this problem is alleviated, progress can only be limited.

Immediately after World War II, civil war broke out as the communists tried to seize power. The fighting lasted until their defeat in 1950, but it left Greece on a limb in south-eastern Europe. Surrounded by communist countries, as well as Turkey, their traditional foe, the Greeks looked to the near-east for international matches. The Mediterranean Games was a popular source of competition, but most of these matches did not count as full internationals. Greece have entered every World Cup since 1954 and every European Championship since its inception, but it was not until the 1970s that regular friendly matches were played against top sides.

Qualification for the 1980 European Championship finals seemed to herald the dawn of a new age and their performances in Italy won them many friends, but that success was not built upon. When at last the Greeks did qualify for the World Cup, after 12 fruitless attempts, it owed more to the expulsion of Yugoslavia from their group. Alketas Panagoulias, who coached the 1980 European Championship side, also led the 1994 team to the USA, but their time there was not a happy one as they lost all three games.

To the end of the 1994-1995 season

Since professionalism was introduced there has not been the expected upturn in club fortunes either. The only appearance by a Greek side in a European final was back in 1971 when Panathinaikos, coached by Ferenc Puskás, lost in the European Cup to Ajax. The Olympic Stadium in Athens plays host to European glory only as one of UEFA's favoured 'neutral' locations for finals.

HOLLAND

At once the best, and at another time among the worst, the Dutch it seems are capable of anything. Along with Denmark they were the first European country to play the game with any degree of success and reached the semi-finals of four successive Olympic Games from 1908. As the amateur ideal started to fade in the 1920s, a long period of decline set in, reaching its nadir with the national side's elimination by Luxembourg in the 1964 European Nations Cup. It was reversed thanks only to the emergence of one of the finest generations of footballers the world has ever known.

Proximity to Great Britain ensured the early development of the game in Holland and by the turn of the century there were numerous clubs playing either football or rugby. In 1889 the football association was formed, making it, after Denmark, the second oldest on mainland Europe. Tours by English sides were common, and in 1898 a league championship was instituted, along with a cup competition the following year. Of the original clubs which made an impact only Sparta Rotterdam remain of any consequence. Ajax were not formed until 1900 and did not win their first championship until 1918, Feyenoord were formed in 1908 and became champions for the first time in 1924, whilst PSV Eindhoven were formed as late as 1913. They did not win the league until 1929.

If the club scene was somewhat confused, the national team were very quick to set their stall out, and until the early 1920s were one of the best sides in Europe. After playing their first match against Belgium in 1905, the Dutch entered the 1908 Olympic Games in London. Given a bye to the semi-finals, they lost against the hosts but won the third place play-off against Sweden. Four years later in Stockholm they again won the bronze medal, having lost to Denmark in the semi-finals. When the Olympics resumed after the First World War, Holland once again reached the last four, this time losing to Belgium. In Paris in 1924, for the fourth consecutive tournament, they lost in the semi-finals, 2-1 to Uruguay. When Amsterdam was chosen to host the 1928 tournament it looked as if the Dutch might at last reach the final. Unfortunately they drew Uruguay in the first round, lost 2-0, and their Olympic dream was over for good.

Apart from twice-yearly matches against Belgium, Holland's international programe was very limited until the 1960s. Defeats in the first round of both the 1934 and 1938 World Cups did little to encourage the game. After World War II, a dreadful sequence of results – just one win in over five years – helped to bring about the modernisation of the game. Fas Wilkes, perhaps the first great name in Dutch football, left to play for Valencia in Spain, and it was felt that if change was not instituted more would leave; so in 1957, along with the creation of a national league for the first time, professionalism was sanctioned.

The immediate effect was the rise of the big clubs, Feyenoord, Ajax and PSV, who have dominated Dutch football ever since. In an attempt to stay alive in the new professional league, there were a spate of mergers between clubs who could not face the challenge alone, but none have managed to rise to the levels of the big three. Who, after all, remembers HVV and HBS Den Haag, who between them won eleven championships in the early years? The new professional league eventually began to sow the seeds of success and in 1970 Feyenoord won the European Cup. The following year it was won by their great rivals Ajax, in the first of three consecutive wins. The Dutch had arrived. Feyenoord won the UEFA Cup in 1974 and PSV did the same in 1978.

Of the many talented footballers who appeared for Holland in the 1970s the most famous was Johan Cruyff, but he was not the only Dutch star at the time. At Ajax, Johan Neeskens, Ruud Krol, Arie Haan, Johnny Rep, Willem Suurbier, Barrie Hulshoff and Gerry Muhren all joined him in the national side at one time or another. Along with the Feyenoord pair of Van Hanegem and Jansen they formed the basis of the team which so nearly won the 1974 World Cup. Under manager Rinus Michels, a key figure in modern Dutch football, the team played 'Total football'. They were all comfortable on the ball, could play in most positions on the pitch, and were highly skilful individuals who moulded well into a team structure.

A consequence of their impressive display was the dispersal of the team around Europe. Cruyff had gone to Barcelona in the first million-dollar deal in 1973, and the rest of the team soon followed, tempted by large offers from Italian and Spanish clubs. Despite this, Holland very nearly won the following World Cup in Argentina, but once again lost to the hosts in the final. Had Cruyff made the trip they might well have won. If ever a team deserved to win a major title it was that Dutch side of the 1970s, but they could not even manage a win in the European Championship, finishing third in 1976 after losing to Czechoslovakia in the semi-finals.

To the end of the 1994-95 season

It seemed as if the Dutch dream was coming to an end with the failure to qualify for the 1982 and 1986 World Cups, but further success was just around the corner. PSV won the European Cup in 1988, whilst Ajax won their first European trophy for 14 years, the Cup Winners Cup, in 1987. In 1992 they became only the second team, after Juventus, to have won all three European trophies with their victory in the UEFA Cup, and they won the European Cup for a fourth time in 1995 beating Milan 1-0 in the final.

Starring in that final for Ajax against his old club was Frank Rijkaard, who together with Ruud Gullit and Marco Van Basten had formed a powerful Dutch trio in the dominant Milan side of the late 1980s. Spearheading a new generation of players brought up on the success of the Cruyff era, they also led Holland to victory in the 1988 European Championships in Germany. Once again under Rinus Michels, the Dutch stuttered in the first round but beat the Germans in the semi-finals and then destroyed the Soviet Union in a scintillating final in Munich. After years of coming so close, they had at last won a major title.

After a disappointing 1990 World Cup in which they lost to their old bogey team West Germany in the second round, the Dutch came close to retaining their European crown in 1992. With Dennis Bergkamp added to the side they played some of the best football seen in the finals in Sweden but fell to the Danes in the semi-final after a penalty shoot-out. In the 1994 World Cup, having eliminated England in the qualifiers, they reached the quarter-finals but lost to Brazil, to complete a remarkable sequence: in every post-war tournament for which they have qualified, Holland have been knocked out by the eventual winners! Except in 1988, that is.

HUNGARY

Proud Hungary! Never has a country come so close to winning the World Cup and yet been so cruelly denied as the Hungarians were in 1954. Regarded as the best team the world had ever seen the 'Magic Magyars', as they were known, lost only one game in six years of international football, and that game was the World Cup final. That team will always be the one all Hungarian national sides are compared to, a burden that will not go away until a team of equal stature is built. Given the state that Hungarian football finds itself in now, that could be a long time in coming.

Hungarian football was very quick to develop, especially in Budapest which along with Vienna and Prague formed the first focus of organised football in central Europe. Among the first clubs formed were Ujpesti in 1885, MTK in 1888 and Ferencváros in 1899, all of whom remain in the forefront of Hungarian football today, but as was traditional in central Europe, football sections were often added on to already existing sports clubs; in Hungary, these tended to be Gymnastic clubs.

In 1901 the football association was formed and Southampton, the first English professional club to travel abroad, came to Hungary. Although they defeated Budapest selections 8-0 and 13-0, it was the spur the Hungarians needed to develop their game. A league was formed in the same year, whilst the following year a national selection travelled to Vienna to take part in the very first international match on the continent.

Although beaten 5-0 on that historic day, the Hungarians developed into a highly original and prolific side, noted for some remarkable individuals. The first of the great Hungarian players was Imre Schlosser. His 58 goals either side of and during the First World War made him the outstanding player of his time and the leading scorer on mainland Europe, a position he held for many years.

Hungarian football flourished in the inter-war period, especially after professionalism was introduced in 1926. Ferencváros, Ujpesti and Hungaria, who had changed their name from MTK in 1927, were among the most feared clubs on the continent. MTK won a staggering 10 consecutive championships in the years up until 1925, but it was in the Mitropa Cup in the 1930s that Ferencváros and Ujpesti, especially, made their mark, with two wins apiece.

With the demise of the national side that had contained Schlosser and the great Alfred Schaffer, who had moved to Germany where he became known as the 'Fussballkönig' - Football king - by his fans at I.FC Nürnberg, another fine team was not long in developing. France were beaten 13-1 in Budapest in 1927, and by the 1934 World Cup Hungary were regarded as being among the favourites. However, they came up against the Austrian 'Wunderteam' and lost to them in the quarter-finals.

In 1938 they reached the final. The stars of this side were Gyorgy Sarosi and Gyula Zsengeller. Sarosi in particular was an influential figure. He had scored in a victory over England in Budapest just prior to the 1934 World Cup and hit a remarkable seven goals against Czechoslovakia in 1937. Zsengeller had scored five as Hungary put eleven past Greece to qualify for the 1938 tournament, and he netted five times in the lead-up to the final against Italy. There, however, the Hungarians were never in the match and lost 4-2.

After that defeat, Hungary, who were much more gifted than the Italians, were accused of being too pretty and lacking the steel to win. It was a lesson learned, and after the war they produced yet another great side to uphold the tradition started by Schlosser and continued by Sarosi.

Despite interference by the communist authorities in the club structure, football flourished after the war. Indeed it was seen by them as a propaganda weapon and no club epitomised this more than Honved in the 1950s. They formed the basis of the national side that went for six years and 48 games with only one defeat, a truly remarkable record.

There was the reliable Grosics in goal, with Jeno Buzansky and Mihaly Lantos in defence; the midfield had Gyula Lorant at centre-half along with Jozsef Bozsik, the captain and record cap winner; whilst the forward line was truly fearsome. Zoltan Czibor and Jozsef Toth operated down the wings whilst Nandor Hidegkuti operated slightly behind Sandor Kocsis and Ferenc Puskás, probably the most deadly striking partnership football has ever seen. Between them they scored an extraordinary 158 goals for the national side, more than some countries have scored full stop! After winning the 1952 Olympic title in Helsinki, Hungary sealed their reputation with a 6-3 victory at Wembley, England's first defeat on home soil by a non-British side. A 7-1 victory in the return in Budapest the following year confirmed them as overwhelming favourites to win the World Cup.

In Switzerland, Hungary played brilliantly. They began with a 9-0 victory over South Korea and followed this up with an 8-3 thrashing of West Germany marred only by a crucial injury to Puskás. In the quarter-finals the notorious Battle of Berne encounter with Brazil left the side battered and bruised, but it did not affect their semi-final performance against the reigning champions Uruguay. In what commentators at the time described as the best match they had ever seen, the Hungarians ran out 4-2 winners in extra-time. It was the first time Uruguay had been beaten in a World Cup match. Koscis, who netted twice, had scored a record 11 goals on the way to the final.

There had never been greater favourites than Hungary as they went into the World Cup final, and when they found themselves 2-0 up against the West Germans early in the match, it seemed they could do no wrong. Questions had been asked as to whether it was wise to bring back a half-fit Puskás, but he seemed to answer them by scoring the first goal. West Germany, however, fought back against all expectations to level the match and then took the lead seven minutes from time. Puskás had what looked a perfectly good goal disallowed shortly after, but the Hungarians had somehow contrived to lose the game. In their six-year run they had played many better sides than the Germans and beaten them with consummate ease. To lose only one match in six years and for that match to be the World Cup Final was a cruel disappointment, and as it transpired, they would not get a second opportunity.

The Hungarian uprising and its subsequent crushing by the Soviet army split the side up. Puskás, Kőcsis and Czibor all decided to make their fortunes in the West, Puskás with Real Madrid, the others with Barcelona. If one person had epitomised Hungary at this time it was Puskás, the 'Galloping Major' as he was known due to his rank in the army. He was without question the greatest Hungarian player of all time.

In spite of this loss of the heart of the team, the football infrastructure in the country was such that by the early 1960s another supremely gifted side had emerged. Talented players, it seemed, simply poured off the production line - chief among the new generation were Florian Albert and Ferenc Bene. Added to this was the reputation Hungary had built up as a nation of top coaches. Bela Guttmann, for example, was only a modestly known player, yet he coached the successful Benfica side of the early 1960s. Hungary were quarter-finalists at both the 1962 and 1966 World Cups, which did not do them justice on either occasion. The shadow of their predecessors always limited the recognition given to this side.

To the end of the 1994-1995 season

Club football had been dominated by Honved in the 1950s, but Ferencváros managed to regain some of their former glories with four titles and a UEFA Cup victory in the 1960s. The 1970s, however, belonged to Ujpesti, who won a remarkable 9 titles in 11 years. The national side did not fare so well and having failed to qualify for the 1970 World Cup they entered a period of decline from which they have yet to escape. Fourth place in the 1972 European Championships remains the last Hungarian performance of note as three successive World Cup appearances from 1978 to 1986 all resulted in first round elimination, although they did catch the eye in 1982 with a record 10-1 win over El Salvador.

Hungary still produces players of high quality, such as Tibor Nyilasi and Lajos Detari, but the game seems to have lost its way. Betting scandals, match fixing and general apathy have characterised recent years. Since the fall of the Communist government in the early 1990s, Hungary has increasingly looked to the West in an attenpt to drag itself out of the mire. Videoton, UEFA Cup finalists in 1985, have been taken over and renamed by Parmalat, the Italian food company while Honved also have new sponsors.

Hungarians will be hoping that if the clubs can make progress they will drag the national side along as well, for the nineties have seen some desperately poor results: two draws with Malta in the 1990 World Cup qualifiers being topped in 1994 by defeat home and away to Iceland and a 7-1 thrashing by Holland. Hungary have never gone more than two World Cups without qualifying - but failure to reach France in 1998 would break that record.

ICELAND

A small population in a remote island closer to Greenland than mainland Europe, where football can only be played in the summer months because it is otherwise too cold or too dark, would seem to be a poor recipe for football success. For years this stereotype did hold true of Iceland, but recently the national team have emerged, if not as a footballing power, then as likely to cause more than the odd upset.

To the end of the 1994 season

Its league football, however, though predating the formation of the national side by some 34 years, has never been of a very high standard. Reykjavik, dominating the island as it does, provided all of the winners until IA Akranes broke the stranglehold in 1951, and since then teams from the smaller towns have fared quite reasonably. Football is a very popular game and crowds of over 2,000 are not uncommon for league games, though the average is nearer 500.

For international matches it is not uncommon to see the Laugardalsvöllur full to capacity, and in recent years they have been treated to some excellent games. The national side first made an appearance in a match against Denmark in 1946, but for the next quarter of a century matches were sporadic. The 1958 World Cup and 1964 European Championship were both entered, but it was not until the 1970s that Iceland regularly took part in these two competitions.

Results were not impressive at first, but as experience was gained they began to improve. East Germany, Wales, Northern Ireland, Norway, Austria, Turkey and most recently Spain and Hungary have all been beaten in Reykjavik. Some very good players have played for the national side, and most are eager to join clubs in the rest of Europe. Arnor Gudjohnsen appeared in the UEFA Cup final for Anderlecht in 1984 and Asgeir Sigurvinsson did so in 1990 for Stuttgart. He was joined there in 1989 by Eyjölfur Sverrisson, who was part of the team which won the 1992 Bundesliga. Others who have made it abroad include Iceland's most capped player, Atli Edvaldsson, who spent eight years in Germany.

Iceland have not come close to qualifying for a major tournament, but more and more they are affecting the outcome of the qualifying groups. Their progress serves as a model for countries such as Malta, Luxembourg and Cyprus as to how the future of their game could be.

ISRAEL

Israel was for many years among the strongest of nations in Asia, but since the rise to prominence in the 1970s of the Arab states, the Israelis have led a strange and often lonely existence. Cast out from the Asian Confederation in 1976 'with regret' - but no doubt considerable relief - Israel has flitted from Europe to Oceania in search of a home, and is the only country to have played a World Cup qualifying match in every continent of the world.

Thankfully the Israelis seem to have a permanent home at last, with both the clubs and the national side accepted into European competitions on a permanent basis. Visits to Israel, often seen by touring sides as a chance to bask in some winter sunshine, will now take on a far more serious aspect.

How Israel will fare in this new competitive environment remains to be seen. Their years in the wilderness have not had a healthy effect on the development of the game, as the association has struggled to maintain a regular fixture list for the national side, whilst nothing was seen of the club sides after their brief flurry in the Asian Champion Teams' Cup in the late 1960s until Maccabi Tel Aviv entered the 1993 European Cup. And with only four million inhabitants, Israel is unlikely ever to become a major power.

Israel did not exist as a nation until 1948 when the United Nations founded the state in what was then Palestine, but football predates that. Growing Jewish immigration to Palestine from Europe had encouraged the growth of the game and in 1928 the Palestine Football Association was formed in Tel Aviv. The presence of British soldiers and officials also gave the game a boost and the winners of the first championship in 1932 were the British Police.

The National Cup competition preceded the championship by four years, during which time it was won by both Hapoel and Maccabi Tel Aviv, who have been a major force in the game since. Domestic football in Israel has been relatively unaffected by the constant state of hostilities with her neighbours, although the invasion by the Arabs in 1948 and the Suez crisis of 1956 did bring about a temporary halt to the game.

A Palestinian side, made up entirely of Jews, took part in the 1934 World Cup and were drawn against Egypt in the qualifiers. These two games, along with the unsuccessful attempt to qualify for the 1938 World Cup and a friendly against the Lebanon, were the only games that Palestine played and it was not until 1949 that the national side was revived, as Israel.

The Israelis always knew it would be difficult to find opponents among their neighbours, and in the first few years after 1948 matches were confined to World Cup qualifying games and the odd friendly. This World Cup experience did give Israel an advantage when they took part in the 1956 Asian Cup, but although they were regarded as favourites for the tournament, South Korea proved too clever for them and they had to be content with second place, a position they secured again four years later.

The 1958 World Cup saw the first hint of the disruption that Israel's position was to cause world football when each of their opponents withdrew from the Asia-Africa section. This left the Israelis as the winners without having played a match, but a new FIFA law that no side except the holders and hosts could qualify without playing a game forced a play-off against Wales. Both matches were lost 2-0. Had the original games taken place, Israel may well have qualified without the need to play Wales, who were thus the unwitting benificiaries of Middle East politics.

Further controversy surrounded Israel's involvement at the 1962 Asian Games. The Indonesian hosts, mindful of their large Moslem population, refused to invite an Israeli team for any of the sports, in a move that nearly broke the Asian Games movement apart. The decision of the Asian Confederation to award Israel the staging of the 1964 Asian Cup may have been foolhardy in such circumstances, but the Israelis made full use of home advantage to win their only honour to date, beating India, a weakened South Vietnamese team and their fierce rivals South Korea.

Although this was not Israel's last appearance - they came third in 1968 - the emergence of the Arab states as a footballing bloc suggested that the Israelis were to become a fading power in Asian football. From the mid-1960s, Israel began to rely on visits by touring European sides for their players to gain experience, although there was a final hurrah in Asian football when they finished second behind Iran at the 1974 Asian Games in Tehran. Even here, controversy abounded. In their semi-final group, both North Korea and Kuwait refused to take the field against Israel and as a result forfeited the points and their hopes of making it to the final.

The Asian Football Confederation clearly needed to sort out the situation and in 1976 Israel were thrown out. The AFC faced a dilema. Either they bowed to pressure from a vocal section of their members or they stood firm and put at risk the future development of the game in the continent, which Israel's presence was beginning to disrupt. They took the former course to howls of protest from the world football community who regarded the decision as a political act. But it is difficult to see how else the AFC could have acted, and in the long run their decision may actually benefit the Israelis. Asia is the weakest of all the continents and Israel's national side and clubs will face a much higher standard of opposition in Europe.

To the end of the 1994-1995 seoson

Not until 1992, however, was Israel formally welcomed into Europe and for fifteen years the national side led a nomadic existence. In 1970 Israel had qualified for the World Cup finals in Mexico, confirming their status as one of the strongest nations in Asia. That side was probably the best Israel has ever produced and they came away from Mexico with two draws, losing only to Uruguay. Mordecai Spiegler scored their only goal and he remains Israel's top scorer and most capped player. That Israel have not qualified since is largely due to the fact that they were adopted as an associate member of Oceania, which was not afforded an automatic berth in the finals.

In the 1990 World Cup, for instance, they were forced to play off against Colombia after winning the Oceania section, and it was no surprise when the stronger South Americans won through. Israel's future prospects for qualification do not look much better in Europe, but with more regular competition the hope is that they can emulate a small country like Denmark and make their presence felt. In the 1994 World Cup they beat France 3-2 in Paris, for their first competititve win on European soil.

ITALY

The Italians will always be big news in football. Their league has more players of quality than any other, their fans are amongst the most passionate in the world, and they have won the World Cup three times. Yet they are not universally popular in the football world: South America in particular has had cause to rue the agents of the big Italian clubs as player after player has been lured away from Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay. Italian football was also held accountable for the demise of the game as an entertaining spectacle when, during the 1960s and 1970s, its catenaccio, or defensive football motivated by the fear of defeat, spread right across the globe.

Despite this, Italy can be the perfect setting for football and has contributed greatly to the development of the game. The first clubs were formed in the three main cultural and industrial centres in Northern Italy. Internazionale Torino, the forerunners of the present day Torino, were formed in 1890; Genoa were formed in 1893 as Genoa Cricket and Football Club; whilst in Milan, Milan Football and Cricket Club, later simply known as Milan, were formed in 1899. The English influence was obvious, and some clubs to this day still retain the title Football Club rather than the Italian Associazione Calcio.

To call Genoa the first league champions is perhaps stretching the point in that the first competition in 1898 consisted of only three games, and until 1910 the number of matches played in each championship remained limited. It was the common practice to play eliminating games by region, often between only two clubs, to qualify for a round robin play-off.

The year 1910 proved to be a watershed for the Italians. Not only did the football association try to set league football on a more firm footing, but a national side was fielded for the first time. Although an impressive debut saw a 6-0 win over France, results well into the 1920s were not outstanding. Italy's first official competition, the 1912 Olympic Games, ended with first round defeat at the hands of Finland.

The 1910 league championship saw a dramatic increase in the number of games played and for the first time a single league was used, but the following year it reverted to regional groupings. As more and more clubs were formed and wanted to join in, these regional leagues became ever more complicated, but not until 1930 was a single national league reintroduced. When it was, it proved to be exactly the boost the game needed to project itself to the Italian population, and neither has had cause to look back since.

These early years were often marked by disorganisation. Although an association had been formed in 1898, its authority was always being challenged, whilst rivalries between the different towns meant that at various times it had its headquarters in Turin, Milan, Turin again and Bologna, before finally settling in Rome in 1929. In 1921 matters seemed to have got out of hand as the championship consisted of 18 regional leagues of vastly different strengths. The big clubs felt at the mercy of their smaller counterparts and in 1922 set up a rival organisation, but that only lasted a year.

The 1930s were exciting times for Italian football. Under the guidance of Vittorio Pozzo the national team reached dizzy heights of success that they have been hard pressed to match since. They won the 1934 World Cup, then won the gold medal at the 1936 Olympics before setting the seal on a remarkable decade with victory in the 1938 World Cup. Only seven games were lost throughout the whole of the 1930s.

The game was still deemed amateur, though for the most part it was nothing of the sort. Huge incentives were given to players, especially at club level where the Mitropa Cup was proving to be a rewarding challenge both on the field and financially. Clubs like Juventus, in a bid to give themselves an advantage in the championship, started to import players from abroad in a tradition that persists to this day. Luisito Monti and Raimundo Orsi were perhaps the most famous. Both were Argentinian, Monti having played in the 1930 World Cup final. That he subsequently played for Italy in the 1934 final gives a small indication why among some nations there was no little resentment of the Italians!

The greatest star of the period was Giuseppe Meazza, one of only two players - the other being Ferrari - who played in both World Cup winning teams. Meazza played for Internazionale, who along with Bologna and Juventus dominated league football at this time. Bologna, however, were the only ones who could turn this domination into success in the Mitropa Cup, winning it in 1932 and 1934. The first victory was achieved by a walk-over after a riot in the other semi-final between Juventus and Slavia Prague led to both teams being disqualified. In the 1934 final however, after losing 3-2 in the first leg to Admira Wien, Bologna pulled off a 5-1 victory, inspired by another of Italy's great players, Angelo Schiavio.

The immediate post-war football story is dominated by the Superga aircrash in 1949. Torino were, at the time, probably the best team Italy had seen and almost without exception formed the national side. On a return trip from Lisbon, however, the aircraft carrying the team crashed into the Superga hill in the suburbs of Turin, killing everyone on board. Among those killed were 10 Italian internationals, the most famous of whom was Valentin Mazzola, father of Sandro Mazzola who would achieve such fame in the 1960s.

Neither the national side nor Torino recovered quickly from the tragedy, and throughout the 1950s Italy faltered. Poor performances in the 1950 and 1954 World Cups were followed by failure to qualify for the 1958 tournament in Sweden, in what was seen as a national disaster. Although they qualified for both the 1962 and 1966 World Cups, on both occasions the performances were once again extremely disappointing. The defeat by North Korea in 1966 was especially humiliating.

Many blamed the number of stranieri, or foreigners, that were playing in the league. Throughout the 1950s, Swedes, Danes, Argentinians, Uruguayans, Brazilians, Englishmen and more were tempted into the Italian game by the vast salaries on offer. Milan had forced their way back to the top of the league after years in the wilderness, largely on the back of the Gre-No-Li trio of Swedes, Gren, Nordahl and Liedholm, whilst Juventus sealed their reputation as the biggest club in the country with players such as John Charles of Wales and the Danish pair Hansen and Praest.

In 1964 it was decided to ban the import of any more foreigners in order to allow Italian players to develop. For so long in the shadow of their foreign counterparts, they were no less skilful but they simply did not get the attention they deserved. The effect of the ban was twofold. Over the period of more than 20 years that the ban was in place, a new generation of Italian stars came to the fore, which ultimately led to the World Cup win in 1982.

On the domestic scene, however, a little of the gloss was taken off the large clubs who, with their foreigners, had looked as if they would dominate European football for good. Milan had won the European Cup in 1963, and were emulated by their local rivals Internazionale the following two years. Inter, in particular, relied heavily on the likes of the Brazilian Jair and Suarez of Spain. For Italian clubs, denied access to players like this, the 1970s proved to be a relatively barren time in European competitions.

Tactics did not help the cause either. Because of the money at stake in the Italian league, and the prestige that went with winning the title, ever more pressure was put on coaches. Catenaccio became the accepted style of play, reinforcing the image of the Italian game as sterile and moribund.

This description applied less to the national side. In the 1970 World Cup, the Italians proved that given the motivation they were as good if not better than most teams. After scoring just one goal in the three group matches, they turned on the style in the quarter and semi-finals, scoring eight goals against the hosts and West Germany. To lose in the final to Brazil was no disgrace. The same thing happened when they finally won the World Cup again in 1982. After three tedious perfomances in the opening group matches, they played four brilliant games and in the end were deserving winners.

The 1990 World Cup, which they hosted, saw the reverse happen. Starting off the tournament as if their very lives depended on winning, they were superb up until the semi-final against Argentina. Clearly the far superior side in that game, they took an early lead but then seemed to want to protect their advantage rather than reinforce their superiority. That age-old cautiousness finally undid them when it mattered most, and they had only themselves to blame as Argentina equalised and then won the penalty shoot-out.

To the end of the 1994-1995 season

With the relaxation of the ban on foreigners, the 1980s saw a tremendous boom in club football as Italian teams once again sought the cream of the world's footballers. Michel Platini was signed by Juventus and led them to many honours both at home and in Europe in the first half of the decade, while perhaps most significantly Diego Maradona was lured by Napoli from Barcelona. The Italians could now claim justifiably that theirs was the strongest league in the world, for without question they had most of the world's top players there. In the 1960s, they had failed to engage Pele, but with Maradona they now had the best player in the world.

As the number of foreigners allowed grew from one per team to the present three, a tradition started with the Gre-No-Li trio was continued as Milan went Dutch with Gullit, Rijkaard and Van Basten, and Internazionale went German with Klinsmann, Brehme and Matthäus. The influence of the stranieri - and perhaps the ban on English clubs - saw the Italians at their most prolific in Europe. Milan won the European Cup three times, whilst Napoli, Juventus, Internazionale, Parma and Sampdoria were all winners of one of the other two competitions.

Whether another decline in the national side has set in due to the emergence of the stranieri is open to debate, but failure to qualify for the 1992 European Championships was not an encouraging sign for the Italians. With freedom of movement for labour in the European Community, in no country will the battle between club and country be more pronounced in the future. Perhaps Italian players ought to buck the trend and move abroad themselves to countries like Spain, Germany or England, in order to increase their profile!

LATVIA

Of the three Baltic countries who enjoyed a brief period of independence during the inter-war years, Latvia were the most successful. Winners of the Baltic Cup on five occasions, they even managed to beat Sweden in one match, although the Swedes were represented by a very inexperienced side on that occasion. As if to prove the point, Sweden won the next encounter 12-0!

Independent once again since 1991, Latvia do not look to be in a very strong position. Only Daugava Riga, formed in 1948 after Latvia's absorption into the Soviet Union, ever appeared in the Soviet first division. In 1949 they finished second from bottom and were not seen again in the top flight. Little remains of the inter-war set-up and much has changed since Soviet times. Skonto Riga have emerged as the top team of the post-independence era, winning the first four championships. In the 1995 UEFA Cup they even managed to knock out Aberdeen, former winners of the Cup Winners Cup.

In 1993 Latvia won the Baltic Cup and the previous year they entered the World Cup for the first time in 54 years, finishing one off the bottom of their qualifying group. But with a growing interest in the game and a population of over three million, they may never qualify for a major tournament, but there is no reason why they should not enter into the mainstream of European football.

LIECHTENSTEIN

That this tiny principality, squeezed in between Austria and Switzerland, should have a national team at all is quite remarkable. The population is just 27,000, and its citizens are more usually concerned with banking and finance than playing football.

The country's football association dates back to 1933 and in 1974 they joined both FIFA and UEFA, but before 1994 few matches were played. In 1981 a trip was made to Korea and the results in the President's Cup were very impressive, especially the victory over Indonesia. The best result to date, however, is the 2-0 victory over China (population over 100 million!) in 1982.

There is no league in Liechtenstein and the seven LFV member teams compete in the lower divisons of Swiss football. There is, however, an annual Cup competition and thewinners have entered the Cup Winners Cup since the 1993 edition. The national team also entered the European mainstream in 1994 when they played their first match in the European Championship, losing 4-1 to Northern Ireland in Belfast. It has to be expected, though, that if they continue to enter the major tournaments they will be on the receiving end of some big scores.

LITHUANIA

Although the largest of the three Baltic republics, Lithuania was the weakest of the trio in the period of independence between the wars. Since the break-up of the Soviet Union, however, it has emerged as the strongest. Ethnically the most homogenous of the three states, the Lithuanians broke away from the Soviet league in 1990 and along with clubs from Estonia and Latvia formed the Baltic league. The Lithuanians even played an international against fellow secessionists Georgia in Tbilisi that year, drawing 2-2.

The Baltic league was won by Zalgiris Vilnius, and without question they are the top club in the region. In 1987 they finished third in the Soviet league, and they twice appeared in the UEFA Cup under the Soviet banner, the only Baltic club ever to do so. The Baltic league, however, lasted only one season and in 1991 Lithuania started its own championship, 52 years after the last one had finished. In a shortened season, Zalgiris won the title two points ahead of Banga Kaunas.

Vilnius and Kaunas are the two largest cities in Lithuania, but since independence they have had their predominance challenged by teams from the smaller cities. In the inter-war period, however, as the then capital, Kaunas dominated the championship (Vilnius at that time was in Poland), and for many years the football association was located in Kaunas. Only since the Soviet occupation in the war has Vilnius come on to the scene.

The Lithuanians entered both the inter-war World Cups held in Europe, but it was not until the 1994 tournament that they could enter again. In the qualifiers for USA '94 they finished above Latvia and Albania. They also won three of the first four editions of the revived Baltic Cup, reinforcing their position as the top nation in the Baltics.

For Zalgiris though, the task of remaining the top team in Lithuania looks more difficult. Increasingly, entrepreneurs are getting involved with clubs, none more so than the 1994 champions ROMAR Mazeikiai. In two years they have gone from being unknowns to champions as a result of a rich sponsor. There is still some way to go, however, before the clubs can begin to make headway in Europe. Ekranas Panevezys, champions in 1993, gave Malta a very rare night of celebration when they lost to Floriana in the first round of the European Cup the following season.

LUXEMBOURG

Ten out of ten for effort, but Luxembourg fail to score at all for achievement. They have entered every World Cup bar the first and have without fail finished last in their qualifying group. Added to this is the fact that after two victories were gained against Thailand and South Korea in the 1980 Marah Halim Cup, Luxembourg set off on a stunning run of 78 games with only five draws to break the losing sequence, which at one point amounted to 32 straight losses.

To the end of the 1994-1995 season

Leaving aside the Marah Halim Cup, which was of a dubious 'A' grade status anyway, the winless run included a further 22 matches and seven years. The night of 25 February 1994, however, was an historic one for Luxembourg as the national side left the field of the Ta'Qali stadium in Malta having beaten their hosts 1-0 in a European Championship qualifier. The barren run had come to an end exactly 21 years, 3 months and 21 days after they had last defeated European opposition, and 22 years, 4 months and 3 days after their last win in a competitive match. The scale of the triumph can be gauged by the fact that it was only their second ever victory in the European Championships, with a similar number of wins having been recorded in the World Cup. To cap that, four months later they beat the Czech Republic at home. It never rains but it pours!

The Federation Luxembourgeoise de Football was formed in 1908 and became a member of FIFA two years later, when a league was also started. Luxembourg is a small country, traditionally involved in both finance and heavy industry, and it was as a form of leisure for the latter's workers that football gained a hold. Nowadays the structure remains amateur, but a few players do manage to make a name for themselves abroad as professionals, usually in France or Belgium.

The three dominant towns in the league are Luxembourg itself, Differdange and Esch. The latter has produced the best known club in the country, Jeunesse Esch, and they remain the only club to have reached the second round of the European Cup, where in 1964 they managed to beat Partizan Belgrade 2-1 at home, although they lost the tie 4-7 on aggregate. Heavy defeats are the norm for most clubs in Europe.

The first international match was played in 1911 against France, and Luxembourg have been very active in international games since. Most of the games, however, have been played against amateur or 'B' selections, and therefore do not show up on their record. This was especially true in the years up until the 1960s, during which time regular matches were contested with both Holland and Belgium in particular, but also against selections from other European countries.

Just occasionally, before 1995, Luxembourg did taste success. France and Belgium were beaten in full internationals, but the most impressive victories came against Portugal in 1961 in the World Cup, and Holland in the 1964 European Championship, when a 2-2 draw in Amsterdam and a 2-1 win in Rotterdam saw Luxembourg qualify for the quarter-finals and a tie against Denmark. The Danes eventually won in a play-off in Amsterdam after a 3-3 and 2-2 draw.

The expansion of UEFA has given football in Luxembourg new hope. Traditionally the bottom seed in their qualifying group and therefore kept apart from sides of equal stature, Luxembourg should now find themselves grouped with opponents they have a chance of beating.

MACEDONIA

Macedonia was the 49th of the current 49 members to be admitted to UEFA, only just meeting the deadline for entry into the 1996 European Championships. Technically known as the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia - after complaints from the Greeks who wanted it to be known as the Republic of Skopje so as not to conflict with their own territory of the same name - Macedonia has emerged relatively unscathed from the troubles affecting Yugoslavia.

Vardar Skopje, Yugoslav Cup winners in 1961, are the biggest team in Macedonia and they won the first two championships after independence. In 1987 they thought they had won the Yugoslav league title, but when a court order overruled a 6-point penalty which had been imposed on 12 clubs at the start of the season, Partizan became champions. It was hard on Vardar, but they did enter the European Cup the following season.

Star of that side was Macedonia's most famous player, Darko Pancev, who subsequently played for Red Star, winning the European Cup in 1991. Runner-up to Jean-Pierre Papin in the European Footballer of the Year poll that year, Pancev moved on to join Internazionale in Italy and captained Macedonia in their first competitive international, a 1-1 draw with Denmark in a European Championship qualifier in 1994. Indeed the Macedonians, seeded in the fourth tier of six for Euro '96, were only three minutes away from beating the holders, despite having a player (Pancev!) sent off.

MALTA

With a population of only 300,000 Malta will never be able to call upon a large pool of players, but it is disappointing that they have not done better. Almost all of their victories have come from games against African or Asian opposition, and of the middle-ranking European powers only Greece and Belgium have been defeated.

The Malta Football Association was formed as far back as 1900, and as a British colony, was affiliated to the Football Association in London. The obvious British influence led to the formation of a league in 1910, with a cup competition introduced in 1935. In 1959, with the permission of the FA in London, Malta decided the time was right to start playing international football and they were granted membership of FIFA. They entered the African section of the 1960 Olympic Games qualifiers but the venture did not turn out successfully; although they held both Morocco and Tunisia to draws at home, they lost to both away.

It was not until the 1970s that Malta began regularly entering the World Cup and European Championship, but Maltese clubs have been steadfast competitors in the three European club competitions since the early 1960s. As would be expected, results have not been good despite the professional status of many of the players, with double-figure aggregate defeats not uncommon.

The club scene has traditionally been dominated by Floriana and Sliema Wanderers, although Valletta FC, Hamrun Spartans and Hibernians Paola make up the traditional big five. Since the inauguration of the Ta'Qali national stadium in 1980, all of the games in the premier league take place there, so technically there are no home games. There is little justification in having any more stadia given that the island is only 316 square kilometres big and that full to capacity, Ta'Qali will hold one tenth of the island's population.

To the end of the 1994-95 season

If there has been little to cheer about at club level, the record of the Maltese national eleven brings little relief either. Bottom of every qualifying group they have ever taken part in, they have occasionally achieved an honourable draw against the likes of Czechoslovakia and Portugal. Until 1980 the Maltese had the 'advantage' of what was considered to be the worst pitch in Europe at the old Empire stadium in Gzira, but that has gone with the completion of the Ta'Qali. With the expansion of UEFA, however, Malta beat Estonia in Tallinn in the 1994 World Cup qualifiers, their first win in a competitive international in over 10 years and within a year they had also beaten Belgium 1-0 at home and seen off Azerbaijan 5-0, their biggest ever win in an international. They also have a player of genuine class in Carmen Busuttil, Malta's all-time top scorer with 20 goals, who has spent many seasons with Genk in Belgium.

MOLDOVA

For years Moldova was a figment of the novelist's imagination, a fairytale land of princes and vampires. But in 1994 under its Romanian name, Moldova was an independent European country playing its first game in the 1996 European Championship. Furthermore, after two games they led their group ahead of Germany and Bulgaria!

For centuries under Polish, Turkish, Russian and finally Romanian rule, Moldova achieved independence from the Soviet Union in 1991. Nesting between the Ukraine and Romania, the country is made up largely of Romanian speakers. Fighting has occurred however in the Trans Donestr region of the country where the majority want independence from Moldova and this has meant a difficult baptism for the new state.

Zimbru, from the capital Chisinau, are the biggest club in the country and have won the first three championships since independence, successfully staged despite the problems in the country. Their great rivals Tigilul Tiraspol have been runners-up on all three occasions but won two of the first three cup competitions played.

NORTHERN IRELAND

The fourth oldest football association in the world; a permanent seat on the International Board, the world's rule-making body; the third oldest league in the world and a history of international matches that stretches back 110 years. This is the heritage of football in Northern Ireland but one which is increasingly under threat. How long will a Northern Ireland team last before it is either swallowed up into a British XI or a United Ireland XI?

The Irish Football Association, not to be confused with the Football Association of Ireland which rules the game in the Republic, until 1923 controlled football throughout the island of Ireland. Until that time, however, the game was a predominantly Northern sport. The association was based in Belfast, and on only six occasions in 40 years did the Irish team play a match in Dublin. Shelbourne and Bohemians of Dublin had the odd cup success, but the real football base was in the North.

The civil war in the early 1920s and the partition of the country led to bitter disputes between the association in the North and its new rival in the South. There were major defections to the Southern body, even from those clubs located in the six provinces which constituted Northern Ireland. A meeting of the four British associations in 1923 decided to recognise the Dublin association, but ordered that clubs located within the six provinces should rejoin the association in Belfast. With the Irish Free State in the South embarking on international matches and running its own league and cup, Irish football was split into two camps, although it was not until 1948 that the North abstained from selecting players for the national side who were from the South.

Along with Wales, Ireland has had to compete fiercely with rugby for the affections of the public. The first foot ball playing club was Ulster FC, a rugby club who formed a football section after an exhibition match between two Scottish clubs, Queen's Park and Caledonian, in 1878 in Belfast. Soon football clubs began to spring up in and around Belfast. The first of these devoted entirely to football, Cliftonville FC, was formed in 1879 by JM McAlery, who was instrumental in the formation of the Irish Football Association in the following year.

Club football in Ireland has never been particularly strong and has always suffered from the loss of its best players to either England or Scotland, but in these early years most of the players appearing for Irish clubs were Scottish. That not many Irish people were playing football can be seen from their early results in international matches. A match against England was organised for 1882 in Belfast and the 13-0 defeat remains their record loss. Heavy defeats were the order of the day until the turn of the century, and although the Irish fairly soon reached the standard of the Welsh, who had had a four year headstart in international matches, it was not until 1903 that Scotland were beaten for the first time, whilst a further ten years were needed to inflict a defeat on England.

For 68 years the Home International Championship for provided Ireland and subsequently Northern Ireland with their only international opposition. Not until 1951 when France visited Belfast did they play a non-British side. During these years, the Home International Championship was won just twice. In 1914 Ireland won it outright, whilst in 1903 it was shared with both England and Scotland.

After 1951, the increase in competitive matches revitalised the Irish and until the competition's demise in 1984, Northern Ireland either won or shared the title on six occasions. Most importantly, in 1958, victories over Italy and Portugal saw them qualify for the World Cup Finals in Sweden. With perhaps the best international team the country has ever had, the Irish reached the quarter-finals, further than either England or Scotland. Danny Blanchflower, the man who led Tottenham to the English League and Cup double three years later, was the linchpin of the side which also contained Billy Bingham, who later achieved great feats as manager of the side, Jimmy McIlroy, Jackie Blanchflower, Danny's brother, a very young Derek Dougan and Peter McParland whose goals in Sweden contributed so greatly to the fine results achieved there.

Of the World Cup team only Peacock did not play his club football in England, and he was a regular for Glasgow Celtic. This highlights the weakness of the league in Northern Ireland. Another weakness that in many ways is even more damaging is the sectarian nature of football in the country. The most successful club, Linfield, are associated with the Protestant community, and in a country where religious violence has been an everyday occurrence, this leads football down a very dangerous path. Before the Second World War, the main challenge to the supremacy of Linfield came from Belfast Celtic, which as the name suggests was a Catholic-based club, modelled on their mentors from Glasgow.

The matches between Linfield and Celtic became the scene of increasing violence between the two sets of supporters and after a particularly nasty incident in 1948, Celtic withdrew from the league and stopped playing soon after, although they still technically exist as a club. They are not the only victims of the Troubles. Derry City withdrew from the league in 1972, and now play in the Republic of Ireland's league. In recent years Cliftonville have become the focus for Catholic support, but trouble has also occurred in games between Linfield and another staunchly Protestant club Glentoran. Glentoran supporters have even been known to wear the green and white of Celtic to goad their opponents.

To the end of the 1994-95 season

Amidst all this, the Irish Football Association has striven to remain neutral in the conflict, and it is perhaps fortunate for them that the best players do play abroad, thus avoiding disputes with clubs alleging biased selection policy for the national side. One player who would have been picked no matter where he played was George Best, the most talented Irishman ever to have played football. Indeed he would have walked into the national side of any country in the world. It is unfortunate for him that at his peak he was denied a world stage to display his talents, for the Northern Irish team of the late 1960s was perhaps at its lowest ebb.

The 1980s saw a dramatic rise in their fortunes, but by then it was too late for Best. Outright champions in the Home International Championship for only the second time in 1980, Northern Ireland qualified for the 1982 World Cup thanks largely to the increase in the number of places given to Europe after the expansion of the final tournament. Once there, however, they impressed everyone with their spirit which saw them finish top of their first round group after beating the hosts, Spain, 1-0 in Valencia. Unfortunately they were drawn in the same group as France in the second round and lost 4-1 against them in the decisive match.

They qualified again for the 1986 World Cup in Mexico, and although drawn again with Spain they could not repeat the victory of four years previously, whilst a defeat by Brazil saw to it that they did not qualify for the second round. Since 1986 the Northern Irish team has been in decline. In 1984 they had won the last Home International Championship, but deprived of the income from the folding of the championship, times are hard, and matches now consist mainly of European Championship and World Cup qualifiers.

Financial pressure, and the rise of football in the Republic of Ireland, has led to calls for the unification of Irish football. There is a united team in rugby union so why not for football? Such a move would seem to make sense, but whether football in this troubled island could rise above the fighting and sectarian hatreds like rugby is open to question.

NORWAY

Norway have always been one of Europe's perennial underdogs. For years they lived in the shadow of Sweden and Denmark, both a rich source of players for the professional teams of Western Europe. Norwegians by contrast very rarely ventured abroad - until recently, that is. Now, with the exposure of their exiles to top quality league football, the Norwegians have become a force at international level. They ended Italy's hopes of qualifying for the 1992 European Championship finals with victory in Oslo, and in 1994 topped their World Cup qualifying group ahead of Holland and England to reach the finals for the first time since 1938.

Norway is a large elongated country in which mountains make communications difficult. It is therefore surprising to see how well distributed football is when it might have been expected to have developed only in and around the capital. Oslo, Bergen, Trondheim and Stavanger of the major towns all have successful clubs whilst even smaller and more remote towns have played a part in the development of the game.

The Norges Fotballforbund initiated a cup competition in 1902, the year in which it was founded, and for the next 34 years this remained the sole source of competition. Norway's oldest club, Odds BK of Skein, founded in 1894, were the dominant force in the early years of the competition and set the trend for the success of non-Oslo clubs.

The national team first took to the field in 1908. An 11-3 defeat at the hands of Sweden was not the best of starts and it was not until ten years later that Norway won their first game. Throughout the years, matches against their Scandinavian neighbours, especially in the Scandinavian Championship, have provided the bulk of the international programme. The 1930s saw the Norwegians at their height as they won the 1929-32 edition.

The 1936 Olympic Games represents Norway's greatest achievement. Against all the odds they reached the semi-finals and only lost to the Italian 'professionals' in extra-time. On the way they caused one of the biggest upsets ever in football by beating the hosts, Germany. Given the backdrop to the game the victory is remarkable. With the Germans roared on by a fanatical crowd which included Hitler, Norway, according to the script, should have crumbled. Instead they played the game of their lives to win 2-0. In a scene reminiscent of the snub to Jesse Owens in the same Games, Hitler stormed out of the stadium in a rage. A 3-2 victory over Poland in the third place play-off gave Norway the bronze medal. Qualification for the 1938 World Cup saw them have the misfortune to draw Italy in the first round. They lost in extra-time by the same score as they had done two years previously in Berlin.

To the end of the 1994 season

Olympic year, 1936, had seen the introduction of a national league for the clubs, although the winner was decided in a series of knock-out games until 1961, at which point a single league was introduced. Not many Norwegians made their name abroad at this time and this was one of the strengths of the league. Thorbjorn Svenssen, for example, was in the 1950s one of the most famous names in Europe, representing his country on 104 occasions, yet he played all his football for Sandefjord BK. Likewise, Jurgen Juve, the most prolific scorer for the national team with 30 goals, played only for SOFK Lyn Oslo.

Only since the early 1980s have the best Norwegian players moved abroad. It started as a trickle but has become a flood. The most famous export has been their national captain Rune Bratseth. Playing for Werder Bremen in Germany, he helped them to two Bundesliga titles, two German Cups and a Cup Winners Cup triumph. Following the lead given by Norway's most capped goalkeeper Erik Thorstvedt, who joined Tottenham in 1988, England has become the most popular destination. Of the 17 foreign-based players used by the national side in 1994, 12 were based with English clubs. After the victories over Holland and England much was expected of the team in America, but over-cautious tactics were their undoing and despite beating Mexico, they were eliminated on goal difference in the first round.

The league in Norway is still amateur and their clubs have struggled in European competitions, only very occasionally making it past the first round. The most successful team of recent years has been Rosenborg of Trondheim, one of the most northerly clubs in the world. The actual holder of that distinction, however, is Tromso - where for two months in the summer you can play a game at two o'clock in the morning without needing to turn the floodlights on!

POLAND

Poland is a country whose boundaries have chopped and changed more than any other European country in recent history. In the 17th century Poland was roughly three times the size it is today and stretched south to include even Kiev, whilst in the 19th century it had shrunk to include only the area around Warsaw, Krakow and Lublin. In the period from 1874 to 1918, when football first started on the continent, it did not even exist at all.

Poland was part of both the German and Russian Empires at this time, and it was the German areas that took most to football at the turn of the century. Königsberg (now Kalliningrad in the Soviet Union), Danzig (now Gdansk), Stettin (now Szczecin) and Breslau (now Wroclaw) were all centres of German football prior to 1945. Warsaw, Lodz, Lwow and Lublin, as part of Russia until 1918, formed the basis of the Polish state that was created in 1921, along with Krakow from Germany.

The Polish Football Federation was formed in 1919 and admitted to FIFA four years later. In 1921 a championship was started, and as if to prove the transient nature of politics at the time, one of the early dominant clubs, Pogon Lwow, would today find itself in the Ukraine. A number of clubs from around this time still exist: Wisla Krakow and LKS Lodz, formed in 1906 and 1908 respectively, remain two of the oldest clubs still playing football at the highest level in Poland, and along with Legia Warsaw, formed in 1916, and Ruch Chorzow, in 1920, they dominated football until the Second World War.

In December 1921 a national side took to the field for the first time in a match against Hungary, and although the record up to 1939 was not outstanding, the Poles managed to hold their own against most sides. The finest player of this generation was Ernst Wilimowski of Ruch Chorzow and he will always be remembered for what turned out to be a personal duel with the Brazilian Leonidas in the 1938 World Cup match in Strasbourg. Both scored four goals, but sadly for Wilimowski and his team-mates, Poland lost 6-5. Two years previously they had reached the semi-finals of the Berlin Olympics only to lose to Austria. In the event, their disappointment was not eased with a bronze medal as they also lost the third place play-off to Norway.

The war and its aftermath brought wholesale changes not only to the boundaries of Poland once again, setting them as they remain to this day, but also to the set-up of club football. In true communist fashion, football was organised from head to toe. The control of clubs passed to various government bodies, whilst at the same time new clubs were created. One of these, Górnik Zabrze, dominated the league from the late 1950s to early 1970s. In 1963 a young Wlodzimierz Lubanski made his debut for Górnik, joining Ernest Pol, who until Lubanski took over his mantle was Poland's most prolific marksman. Lubanski was the spark that ignited Polish football which in the post-war period had progressed steadily but not spectacularly.

By the end of the 1960s Poland had embarked on an era of success that lasted the best part of 15 years and included Olympic gold and silver medals as well as third place in the 1974 World Cup and a semi-final appearance in 1982.

Central to the side that won the 1972 Olympic Games was Lubanski, but alongside him were Kazimierz Deyna and Robert Gadocha, both prolific goalscorers. Unfortunately for Poland, Lubanski was injured and did not play in the 1974 World Cup but Deyna and Gadocha were joined by Grzegorz Lato and Andrzej Szarmach, two more players who seemed to be able to score with ease. Not only was the attack formidable, the defence was also particularly strong, dominated as it was by the giant Jan Tomaszewski in goal along with Wladislav Zmuda and Jerzy Gorgon in front of him. Lato especially emerged as a star after the World Cup where his seven goals were instrumental in taking Poland to third place.

Remarkably the team kept together for most of the 1970s. Lubanski finally bowed out after the 1978 World Cup, but by this time Zbigniew Boniek, perhaps Poland's best known player, had made his debut, and the side that entered the World Cup in Argentina was perhaps the strongest ever to represent Poland. However, although they reached the second round, they were disappointing against both Brazil and Argentina. The 1982 World Cup side fared better, reaching the semi-finals before losing to Italy, but the achievement to a large extent papered over the cracks that were appearing in Polish football.

Many of the well-known players were given permission to move abroad, Boniek to Juventus, Zmuda to Verona, Lato to Lokeren and Szarmach to Auxerre for example, and this exodus left the domestic game in a poor state. Since the fall of the communist government, matters have, if anything, become worse. For clubs left to fight for their existence in the commercial world, the sole source of money seems to be the sale of players to clubs in the West, and this in turn lessens interest. On only three occasions in 1994 and 1995 was there a crowd of 20,000 in the league. The majority of games attracted less than 5,000. With so many players gaining experience abroad, the national side may well regain some of their former stature in time, but they have not qualified for a major tournament since 1986.

Given the size of the country, there is no reason why clubs such as Górnik Zabrze and Legia Warsaw should not be up there with the best on the continent. The main problem is that the regions of heavy industry and mining were always the heartland of soccer in Poland, and it is these very areas that have borne the brunt of the post-communism modernisation process. The Katowice conurbation containing Chorzow, Bytom and Zabrze, along with Lodz, Krakow, Poznan and Wroclaw, once burgeoning cities, are now wracked by unemployment. There is simply no money to be spent on what at the moment is a poor standard of football.

Matters have not been helped by scandals on the field, none more so than the match-fixing affair of 1993 which saw Legia Warsaw stripped of their title. Both Legia and LKS Lodz went into the last day of the season level on points with Legia having a goal difference advantage of three. LKS duly won their last game 7-1 at home to Olimpia Poznan and surprise, surprise, Legia won 6-0 away to Wisla Krakow. Smelling a rat, the Polish FA deducted 2 points from all four teams leaving Lech Poznan as champions.

PORTUGAL

Portugal's football fame rests on three laurels: the continued excellence of Benfica, Sporting and FC Porto, the 1966 World Cup, and Eusébio. The Portuguese were without doubt one of the great nations of the 1960s. Benfica appeared in five European Cup finals, winning two of them, whilst the national side, based as it was on these Benfica players, enjoyed its most successful era. The Portuguese will always produce players of talent - they have won the World Youth Cup twice - but for the senior team, a record of just three appearances in the finals of a major tournament is a woeful statistic.

The Federaçao Portuguesa de Futebol was formed in 1914, but it was not until eight years later that it organised a competition for the numerous clubs that had been formed. Until this time, clubs had taken part in local competitions, with the major centres in Lisbon and Oporto. Indeed the Portuguese Federation was formed as a result of the merger of the two associations from these cities.

Most of the clubs still prominent today were formed around the turn of the century. Benfica were founded in 1904 whilst their great rivals Sporting and FC Porto appeared two years later. FC Porto were the winners of the first cup competition in 1922, and since then Portuguese football has been dominated by these three teams in a way that is unique in European football. The league championship, introduced in 1935, has only ever been won by four teams. Apart from the big three, Belenenses in 1948 are the only other team to have won the major prize.

To the end of the 1994-95 season

The national team did not have an auspicious start. In December 1921, a friendly match was organised against neighbours Spain. It was not a success and throughout the next three decades matches were fairly infrequent, with Spain providing the only regular opposition. This reluctance to get a national team together more often still persists today. In 1988 only two games were played whilst 1990 saw only four, far too few to achieve anything at the highest level.

Club football has traditionally been the strength of the Potuguese game. By the mid 1930s Benfica, Sporting and Porto had wrested control of the Cup from other pretenders, and they dominated the new league from the outset. With big memberships, all three clubs built large stadia which in turn attracted bigger crowds and so the cycle continued. For many years Benfica's Stadium of Light in Lisbon was the biggest club ground in Europe. Clubs like Belenenses, Boavista and teams from provincial towns such as Setubal and Guimaraes were simply unable to compete. It is a remarkable statistic that only 10 sides have ever managed to finish in the top three in Portugal, and five of those have done so on two occasions or fewer.

The early 1960s saw Portugal finally make an impact on the European game. In 1961 Benfica won the European Cup, beating Barcelona in the final. The following year they won it again, this time beating Real Madrid in a thriller in Amsterdam. A third final the year after that ended in defeat at the hands of Milan at Wembley, whilst the losses in the 1965 and 1968 finals had more to do with the fact that both games were effectively played away rather than on neutral territory. In 1965 they lost to a sterile Internazionale by the only goal in the San Siro, whilst in 1968, Wembley was the scene of another defeat for them, this time at the hands of Manchester United.

The basis of the Benfica side was also the core of the national side in the 1960s, and the central figure was Eusébio, who along with Mario Coluña was Mozambiquan by birth. Both were spotted young, brought over to Portugal, and qualified to play for the mother country. The use of players from their colonies gave Portuguese sides an aura of mystique, as European crowds in the 1960s were still unused to black footballers. Jose Aguas was another African-born player, from Angola, and he scored two goals, one in each of the finals, that helped Benfica in their European Cup triumphs. The other great players for both Benfica and Portugal in the 1960s included Costa Pereira in goal and Germano, who is often rated as the best centre-half of his generation, with Cavem and Jose Augusto on either wing keeping Eusébio, Coluña and Torres well supplied in the centre. Eusébio, however, was the undoubted star.

Qualification for the 1966 World Cup reversed a trend that had seen six previous unsuccessful attempts to qualify, but once there the Portuguese played some of the best football of that or any other tournament, beating Hungary, Bulgaria and Brazil with great style in the first round. The quarter-finals saw them pitted against the North Koreans. Three goals down after half an hour, Portugal looked in serious danger, but one of the most inspired individual performances ever witnessed in the World Cup saw Eusébio score four goals as his side came back to win 5-3. It is often said that it is worse to lose a semi-final than a final, and for Eusébio, the defeat by England at Wembley provoked the most publicised tears until Paul Gascoigne was moved to the same 24 years later. Despite his nine goals, Eusébio was denied the opportunity to appear in the World Cup final, a stage he richly deserved.

The Portuguese have struggled to live up to the great reputation of this side and the 1970s saw a decline both of the national team and the club sides. Not until 1983, when Benfica lost to Anderlecht in the UEFA Cup, did a Portuguese side appear in another European club final. It sparked a mini-revival as the following year FC Porto reached the Cup Winners Cup final and the national team were unlucky to lose a thrilling semi-final to France in the European Championships. Qualification for only their second World Cup in 1986 followed, but although the trip to Mexico proved to be a disaster, FC Porto then became the third club from Portugal to win a European honour when they won the 1987 European Cup, beating Bayern Munich in the final.

Portuguese football has the makings of being among the best in Europe. Two more European Cup final appearances by Benfica in 1988 and 1990 are testament to the strength of the top Portuguese clubs, and victories in the 1989 and 1991 World Youth Cups show that quality players are still being produced in Portugal. The challenge is to blend the native Portuguese players with the numerous foreign stars playing their league football in Portugal, as well as achieving the right balance between club and country. Until the national team is more consistent and given a proper programme which will allow it to fulfil its capabilities, Portugal will remain a curiosity on the European scene.

REPUBLIC OF IRELAND

For many years the Republic of Ireland's footballers struggled along, not only in the shadow of their neighbours in the North but also as poor cousins of rugby union and the indigenous sports of the island such as Gaelic football and hurling. But ever since Jackie Charlton, a World Cup winner with the English in 1966, took over as manager of the national side in 1986, football in the South has risen to a prominence that it did not previously enjoy.

Football had never been traditionally strong in the South. The Irish Football Association was located in Belfast and from the area that now constitutes the Republic, only Shelbourne, Bohemians of Dublin and Shamrock Rovers regularly took part in either the league or the cup before partition in 1921.

A championship and a cup were initiated the following year but the league has been characterised by the departure of all its best players to either England or Scotland, and has therefore not had the chance to develop. Financial crises and the closure and reformation of clubs have for a long time been the order of the day. Cork, the second largest city in the country, has been represented by five different clubs called by 14 different names, in so far as it is possible to connect all the different teams.

To the end of the 1994-95 season. The totals for Shelbourne and Bohemians include honours won in the All Ireland League pre-1922.

With a great many professionals playing in England and Scotland, the Republic were always 'on the verge' of becoming a good side. Their first match was in the 1924 Olympic Games in Paris and saw a 1-0 victory over Bulgaria. Holland, however, won the quarter-final tie, and although Ireland have entered the World Cup on every occasion since 1934, international fixtures were the exception rather than the rule until after the Second World War.

At times the results of these international matches were encouraging. West Germany, for example, were defeated twice in the late 1950s and early 1960s. West Ham and Manchester United's Noel Cantwell, who played at this time, emerged as perhaps the first major star from the Republic, but was followed soon by Johnny Giles, the linchpin of the very successful Leeds United side of the 1960s and early 1970s.

The depth of the squad was never quite sufficient, however, to qualify for the final tournament of either the World Cup or European Championship. Despite the presence of Liam Brady and Frank Stapleton, this trend continued right through to the late 1980s when, in a bold move, the Football Association of Ireland appointed Charlton as manager. Designing a set of tactics based very much on the more robust side of the English game, which all the players were used to, Charlton gave the team a belief in itself. They qualified for the 1988 European Championship finals in West Germany and their performance there set the scene for furure years. The Irish supporters brought a refreshing dose of good humour to the tournament, whilst the team, despite the absence of Brady, came close to making the semi-finals after beating England in their opening game.

Two years later the Irish qualified for the World Cup finals for the first time and reached the last eight before losing to Italy in Rome. A curious fact about their performance was that they got so far by scoring only two goals and indeed without actually winning a match! With limited resources, Ireland relied to a large degree on their fighting spirit in adversity and this was certainly evident in Italy. They were criticised in some quarters for their policy of poaching English and Scottish players with tenuous Irish links, but there could be no doubt that the policy had paid off.

Despite not qualifying for the 1992 European Championships, Ireland proved that their success was well founded by making it to USA '94 where they did win a game - sensationally, in their opening game against the eventual finalists Italy. But in the heat of Orlando the team struggled for the rest of the tournament. They qualified for the second round but lost emphatically to Holland. The national team has been a remarkable success: the challenge now facing the FAI is how to develop club football in Ireland.

ROMANIA

Romania took to football before most of her Balkan neighbours. The Federatia Romana de Fotbal was formed in 1908, a full 15 years before neighbours Bulgaria sought to do the same. The initial impulse to organise football came from the growing number of teams that were playing the game at that time, not only in Bucharest but in the rich oil fields of Ploiesti. Here a growing number of industries, such as textiles, had sprung up and many of them were run by English companies.

At first the indigenous population were hesitant about taking up the game, but in Prince Carol, the heir to the Romanian throne, they had a perfect role model, and it was at his instigation that the football federation was formed. In 1910, Prince Carol formed the larger Federation of Romanian Sports Societies, which the football body immediately joined. So keen was the prince on sport, and football in particular, that he became the first General Secretary of the Federation.

A championship was started in 1910, and the first champions, Olimpia Bucharest, contained several Britons in their side, but the First World War nearly killed the game. As the popularity of the game declined, so did the popularity of Carol, who was by now King, and in 1925 he abdicated. The ethnically Hungarian Transylvania, in the north-west of the country, was left as the main area where football was still played. Timisoara in particular was a stronghold and remained so throughout the inter-war period.

In June 1922 a match was played against Yugoslavia in a game that represented Romania's first ever and Yugoslavia's first on home soil. The Yugoslavs provided regular opposition in the inter-war years, and in the 1930s the Balkan Cup gave a competitive edge to the games. Bulgaria and Greece also took part in these tournaments, and of the four nations, Romania was the most successful with three titles.

King Carol was back in business in 1930, and he insisted Romania take part in the first World Cup in Uruguay. He selected a squad of players and then persuaded their employers to allow them leave to travel to South America. As one of only four European teams to make the journey, they were given a splendid welcome by the hosts although the hospitality did not extend to the pitch. Having beaten Peru, Romania lost 4-0 to Uruguay in the crucial match of the group and so failed to qualify for the semi-finals.

Romania entered all of the first three World Cups, but luckily did not have to travel so far for the 1934 and 1938 tournaments because they did not reach the second round in either. The eventual finalists Czechoslovakia ended their hopes in 1934, but it was a much more unlikely source, Cuba, who knocked the Romanians out in 1938, even if they did need a replay. Two players stand out from this time, the captain Emeric Vogel and the prolific scorer Iuliu Bodola, who to this day remains the top scorer for the national side.

The communists took control of the government in 1944, and as was standard practice they reorganised the game from top to bottom. Of all the Eastern Bloc countries, however, Romania was the last to benefit from the new system. In fact, the extraordinary thing was that when its allies were at their strongest, Romania was at its weakest, and whilst football has fallen into disrepair in the late 1980s in Poland, Hungary, Bulgaria and Czechoslovakia, Romania has embarked on its most successful era ever.

Two clubs have dominated Romanian football in the post-war period, Dinamo Bucharest, the team of the despised Securitate police, and Steaua Bucharest, the team of the army. At no time was this dominance more marked than in the 1988 season, when out of 34 games, both won 30 and the only separating factor was that Steaua had beaten Dinamo at home and drawn away.

Steaua, known as CCA Bucharest in the 1950s, won their first championship in 1951, Dinamo in 1955. Since then, apart from the occasional success of provincial teams like Petrolul Ploiesti, UT Arad, Arges Pitesti and Universitatea Craiova, the championship has remained a stronghold for these Bucharest teams.

Until the 1980s Romanian football was generally unremarkable. A few good players such as Florea Dumitrache, who scored two goals in the 1970 World Cup Finals, did emerge but not in any great numbers. Qualification for the 1970 World Cup, their first post-war, was followed by their reaching the quarter-finals of the 1972 European Championships before losing to Hungary after a play-off, but the upswing in fortunes was only temporary. Despite the presence of Dudu Georgescu and Anghel Iordanescu, two of the great names in Romanian football, it was not until 1984 that the Romanians qualified for a major tournament again.

To the end of the 1994-95 season

The early 1980s saw the government of Nicolae Ceausescu become even more murderous than before and the two implements of his power, the army and the police, both used their football clubs to enhance their reputations even further. If Steaua and Dinamo had been powerful before, they were now transformed into sides that were almost unbeatable. This helped the national side, and led by Ladislau Bölöni, Romania's most capped player, they pulled themselves out of the doldrums. Though the 1984 European Championship in France was not a success, it proved to be the launching pad for Romania's emergence as a first-class football nation.

The late 1980s were an extraordinary time for Steaua in particular. Not only did they remain unbeaten for three consecutive seasons but in 1986 they became the only team from behind the Iron Curtain to win Europe's top prize, the European Cup, beating Barcelona 2-0 on penalties in the final. Three years later they were back again, but were on the end of a sound thrashing by Milan.

Not only were Steaua rampant at this time, the national side enjoyed a renaissance which included qualification for the World Cup in 1990. Steaua players were well represented in the side as it was common practice for all the best players to be recruited into either the Dinamo or Steaua camps.

The best known Romanian player of the 1980s has been Georghe Hagi, but he has been well supported by players such as Silviu Lung in goal, Mircea Rednic, Michael Klein, Dorin Mateut, Gheorghe Popescu, Rodion Camataru and Marius Lacatus, all of whom have been in demand in the West since the downfall of Ceausescu. Generally acknowledged to be one of the better sides in the World Cup in Italy, they were unlucky to lose on penalties in the second round to the Republic of Ireland.

Better was to come in the 1994 World Cup. With a side built around Hagi, Romania almost made it to the semi-finals. In a scintillating display in their first match they beat one of the pre-tournament favourites, Colombia, in style, whilst in the second round, in what was by far the best match of the tournament, they beat Argentina 3-2 with Ilie Dumitrescu outstanding. Despite losing to Sweden on penalties in the quarter-finals, they returned home to a huge reception.

RUSSIA

The Soviet Union may have passed into history, broken up into 15 independent states, but the largest of those, Russia, is still the biggest country in the world and has a population of nearly 150 million to draw on in its attempt to build on the strong Soviet football tradition. Other than the Baltic states, Russia was the only ex-Soviet country already to have played international football under its own banner. Eight games were played before 1917 and all were lost, two of them rather heavily. A 16-0 defeat at the 1912 Olympics by Germany was followed two weeks later by a 12-0 thrashing at the hands of Hungary. Thankfully for Russia their second venture into international football has not been quite so traumatic on the field, although off it they have again grabbed the headlines.

Although vast tracts of Russia lie in Asia, almost all of the football activity has been centred in the European area, and it was here that the game first took root. The first known side was formed by the English managers of the Morozov cotton mills in Orekhovo, Harry and Clement Charnock. Clad in the colours of Blackburn Rovers, the Charnocks' favoured team, Morozov were the leading light of football in the Moscow area, and when football was reorganised in 1923 on Soviet lines they became Dynamo Moscow, the team of the Electrical Trades Union.

By the early years of the 20th century, leagues had sprung up in many of the major cities of the Russian Empire, most notably in St Petersburg, which was then the capital. In 1897 the Amateur Sports Club of St Petersburg formed a football team which led to the creation of the league in that city. It was not until 1912 that the All Russian Football Union was created and a short-lived championship for representative sides introduced. Though widely played, football was largely a pastime of the privileged classes, and as a result there was not much strength in depth nor an eagerness to develop the game, as was shown in the ill-fated trip to the Stockholm Olympics. Indeed, football remained low key until after 1945, held back by political considerations, the vast size of the country and the harsh weather conditions throughout much of the year.

Following the dissolution of the Soviet Union, 1992 saw the first Russian championship and in August that year the national side played their first game. Immediately there was controversy as the Russians were given the World Cup berth allocated to the Soviet Union, to howls of protest from the Ukraine which had always provided its fair share of players for the Soviet national team. Further controversy dogged that World Cup campaign as a players' revolt led to most of them refusing to go to USA '94. Tactical differences with coach Pavel Sadyrin were cited as the reason, but it owed more to their wanting the return of Anatoly Byshovets, who as coach had taken the players' side in a dispute with the federation over payments. Not surprisingly, without their best players Russia were eliminated in the first round in America, but striker Oleg Salenko did set a record by scoring five goals in the 6-1 win over Cameroon, the most ever in a single match at the World Cup finals.

As for the health of the domestic game, much will depend on how the Russian economy fares. Crowds have dwindled as the stars have gone abroad, and the top clubs will face a tough task shaking off Russia's record of never having won a European club title (Ukraine's Dynamo Kiev and Georgia's Dynamo Tbilisi were the only such Soviet successes) However, there were signs of promise when in 1993 CSKA Moscow knocked holders Barcelona out of the European Cup and Spartak reached the semi-finals of the Cup Winners Cup. Indeed, Spartak have emerged as the strongest club in the new league, winning the first three championships and each time qualifying for the European Champions League.

SAN MARINO

San Marino is the smallest independent country in Europe. With a population of just 22,000 it is located entirely within northern Italy 50 miles to the east of Florence. It was to the general surprise therefore that San Marino sought and gained membership of both FIFA and UEFA in 1988 and entered the 1992 European Championship.

The experience was not an especially happy one but there were no rugby scores, and the qualifying campaign for the 1994 World Cup not only brought their first point, from a 0-0 draw with Turkey, but also a place in the record books, Davide Gualtieri's goal after nine seconds against England being the fastest ever in the World Cup.

A league has been in operation in San Marino since 1986, the same year a cup competition was launched. Made up of ten clubs, the league is played over 18 games after which the top four, plus the second division champions, play-off for the title. In 1994 the second division side almost won it, La Fiorita losing in the final to Tre Fiori. San Marino have never entered a team in the European club cups, the only member of UEFA not to have done so.

Something historians will be looking out for is how long it will take San Marino to gain their first international win, and whether they will match Luxembourg's record of games without a win in the process.

SCOTLAND

Scotland may not have invented football, but the country contributed hugely in the development, spread and rise in popularity of the game. More often than not it was Scottish immigrant workers who showed the locals how the game was played as it spread abroad, whilst in Britain, both Irish and English teams regularly featured large numbers of Scots before the turn of the century.

England in particular has continued in this vein as Scottish players continue to go south to further their careers. From great early teams like Preston North End and Sunderland to modern-day Liverpool, Scots have made their mark not only as players but also as managers. Much of the current reputation of both Manchester United and Liverpool is due to two Scots, Matt Busby and Bill Shankly, and it is a tradition carried on today by the likes of Alex Ferguson at United.

To look at Scottish football only in terms of its contribution in other countries, however, would be to miss out on a proud history within its own borders. Queen's Park Football Club, formed in 1867 by members of a Glasgow YMCA, was the first Scottish club to be formed. Named after the park in which the members used to play, they were the standard bearers of football in Scotland before the turn of the century. Devoutly amateur, even to this day, their home, Hampden Park, remains the spiritual home of Scottish football.

A great many of the present-day clubs were formed in the 1870s, and in 1873 it was felt necessary to form a Scottish Football Association to regulate the game north of the border. Although part of the United Kingdom, Scotland did not come under the control of the Football Association in London, and in respect of its contribution to the world game it has remained a separate entity to this date, still keeping its permanent seat on the world's rule-making body, the International Board.

Glasgow was chosen as the location for the association in preference to the capital Edinburgh, where the Scottish Rugby Union was founded in the same year. Over the years Glasgow has come to be regarded as the football capital of Scotland. Edinburgh, on the other hand, with Murrayfield as the second 'National Stadium' and home to the Scottish rugby team, has never been regarded as a football city, despite the presence of Hibernian and Heart of Midlothian, the city's two football teams.

A year after its formation, the Scottish FA launched a cup competition based on the English model. Naturally, Queen's Park were the first winners, and in the great amateur era before professionalism was adopted in 1893, they won the competition on ten occasions. Their victory in the 1893 tournament was a watershed in the development of the game. In the year that professionalism was introduced, it was the last honour they won. Their opponents that day, Celtic, though defeated, had the last laugh. They represented the new face of Scottish football, and along with their fierce rivals Rangers, soon started on a course of total domination of the domestic game.

This two-club domination stands no comparison elsewhere in world football, with the exception of the Montevideo giants, Peñarol and Nacional. The similarities with Uruguay do not end there either. Both countries have remarkably small populations in relation to their impact on the game. Though Scotland have never been crowned world champions like their South American counterparts, they were for 30 or so years the top national side in the world. Not until the turn of the century did England begin to match them.

The England-Scotland rivalry on the international field dates back to 30 November 1872, when the first ever international match took place. England, represented by players from teams like the 1st Surrey Rifles, Oxford University, Wanderers and Sheffield Wednesday, faced a team of Scots who - surprise, surprise - all came from the Queen's Park club. The 0-0 scoreline seems somewhat surprising in that of the 22 players on the the pitch, 14 were forwards! The England-Scotland game remained an annual encounter and, apart from the war years, took place every year until 1990. Wales were added to the fixture list in 1876, and with the inclusion in 1884 of Ireland, the Home International Championship was launched. Scotland's total of 41 victories in this tournament, although 13 less than England's, ranks as a considerable achievement.

The matches against England provided the first tactical breakthrough in the game, and it was a Scottish innovation. In the very early years, football consisted of a player receiving the ball and dribbling with it until he lost it or scored. In the 1870s, the Scottish national side introduced the concept of passing, and the results in the international matches of this time show that they were the masters of this new style. The Scots were also at the forefront of the next great tactical leap in the 1880s, with the introduction of the 2-3-5 formation.

While the British Isles was the focus of world football Scotland played an important part in the development of the game, but by the end of the First World War they were becoming increasingly isolated. Scottish club sides had been amongst the first British sides to make tours abroad, especially to Scandinavia, but it was not until a tour in 1929 to Scandinavia and Germany that Scotland played an international match against anyone other than a British side.

It soon became apparent that valuable ground had been lost when in 1931, in the space of four days, they were beaten 5-0 by Austria and 3-0 by Italy. Three years previously a false light had been cast on the Scottish game when a team called the 'Wembley Wizards' thrashed England 5-1 on their own territory. That Wembley team was a good one, but it highlighted a major problem that the Scots have had to deal with down the years: the loss of their best players to English clubs.

In that side were three of the greatest names of Scottish football: Hughie Gallacher, Alex James and Alec Jackson. Gallacher played for Newcastle, James for Preston and later notably for Arsenal, whilst Jackson plied his trade with Huddersfield. Between them they could only muster 45 caps. James in particular suffered through refusals to release him for internationals as well as the inbred reluctance of the Scottish FA to select 'Anglo-Scots'. His eight caps belie his reputation as one of the most influential figures in football at that time. The other of the giants of the Scottish game at the time, Alan 'the Wee Blue Devil' Morton, by contrast stayed in Scotland and won 31 caps.

Faced with an exodus on such a large scale, it is surprising that league football managed to survive in Scotland. That it did was largely the result of a continual flow of talented players and two clubs, Celtic and Rangers. In religion, Scotland is a divided country with very active Protestant and Catholic traditions. Founded in 1888 to help finance soup kitchens for the poor of the city, Celtic are the standard bearers of the largely Irish-descended Catholic community, and the Irish tricolour is still flown at the ground today.

Rangers on the other hand have been fierce proponents of the Protestant community since they were founded in 1873. It took over 100 years for them to sign a recognised Catholic. When Mo Johnston joined Rangers in 1989 it was breaking new ground in that not only was he a Catholic, he had also played for Celtic in the past. The rivalry is strong, its intensity matched perhaps only elsewhere in the world by the Real Madrid-Barcelona encounters in Spain, and it has kept Scottish football on its feet, where in different circumstances it might have withered away.

Rangers and Celtic have completely dominated the league and cup. Between them they have won the title in 81 of 99 league seasons, and they have faced each other in the Cup final on 13 occasions. This hegemony has at various times been tested, most notably in recent years with the rise to prominence of Aberdeen and Dundee United and the continuing presence of Hearts and Hibs from Edinburgh, but it will never be broken as long as the set-up in Scottish football remains as it is at present.

To the end of the 1994-1995 season

The post-war years were troubled ones for the national side. Despite qualifying for the 1950 World Cup, a competition which up until that point they had refused to enter, in a fit of pique the Scots withdrew, feeling that as they had finished only second in their group a place was not merited. Such arrogance did not deter them from travelling to Switzerland four years later, as they again finished second behind England in the Home International tournament which was used as a qualifying group.

The Scots must have wished they had stayed away again after a 7-0 humiliation by Uruguay ensured an early exit from the tournament. Since then, the national side has been no more than a medium power in European football. Five times in a row from 1974 they reached the World Cup finals, but never managed to progress beyond the first round. Qualification for the 1992 European Championships marked the first such success in seven outings, but qualifying for the final tournaments of the World Cup and European Championship would seem to be the limit of what the Scots can achieve. To actually win either of them is probably beyond their reach.

The same could be said of Scotland's club football. The late 1960s saw it at its strongest. In 1967, Celtic became the first British side to win the European Cup and were losing finalists three years later, whilst in 1972, Rangers won the Cup Winners Cup. In a country where all of the stars seemed to play abroad, Jimmy Johnstone, a crucial figure in the success at Celtic at the time, bucked the trend and stayed at home. He was part of a side which won a staggering nine consecutive championships, only one short of the world record. The players of true international class who left, however, still outnumbered those who stayed and included such famous names as Denis Law at Manchester United, Ian St John and Kenny Dalglish at Liverpool, Billy Bremner at Leeds . . . the list goes on.

Scottish clubs inevitably suffered and although Aberdeen won the Cup Winners Cup in 1983 and Dundee United reached the final of the UEFA Cup in 1987, Scottish influence in European competitions has waned. In the late 1980s, Rangers, having set themselves up with one of the most modern stadiums in Europe, not only started to reverse the southward flow of players by buying English internationals, but also recruited from the continent in a bid to revitalise their European ambitions. In the long run the policy may work, but success has not been forthcoming as yet. At home they are unchallenged, and since the late 1980s have won seven consecutive championships.

There is potential in Scottish football. An unusually high percentage of the population either follows or takes part in the game, and this is a key factor in helping to overcome the disadvantage of a relatively small population; whether the lead given by Rangers in facing the future will bring any more success is open to debate.

SLOVAKIA

It was pressure from Slovakia that led to the split with the Czech Republic at the beginning of 1993, but the Slovaks were not able to start their own championship until later in the year and did not play their first international until 1994. The Slovaks have always had a very proud sense of national identity, and it meant a great deal to the people to see a Slovak XI take the field for an international in Bratislava over 50 years after the city had last witnessed such an event. Of the two new countries, Slovakia is much the weaker economically but has a football tradition that is in many ways the equal of the Czech Republic.

Football took longer to catch on in Bratislava than in Prague, however, and it was not until the post-1945 period that any serious challenge was made in the Czechoslovakian league. A brief period of independence during the Second World War had seen Slovan Bratislava - then called SK Bratislava - emerge as the strongest team in the republic. From 1949 to 1951, back in Czechoslovakia, they won a hat-trick of titles, the first time the championship had gone outside Czech territory. They were champions eight times in all before 1993, but were not the only team from Slovakia to win the league. Their crosstown neighbours Inter won one title, while most remarkably Spartak, from the small town of Trnava, were victorious on five occasions.

Slovan were also the only Czechoslovakian side to win a European club title when they won the Cup Winners Cup in 1969. Having beaten Porto and Torino on the way to the final, they defeated Barcelona 3-2 in Basle to lift the trophy. The Slovak presence in the national side was also very influential. Of the 13 who played against West Germany in the 1976 European Championship final, nine were from Slovak clubs.

Not surprisingly, Slovan won the first championship after 1993, but the season was characterised by poor crowds; it is hard to see Slovak clubs making an impression in Europe in the immediate future.

SLOVENIA

In football terms, Slovenia was the weakest of all the republics that made up Yugoslavia. Only Olimpija from the capital Ljubljana ever appeared in the Yugoslav first division, and their only moment of note came when they held Red Star to a draw in the 1970 Cup final before losing in the replay.

Over the years two Slovenians of international class have emerged. Branko Oblak won 46 caps for Yugoslavia between 1970 and 1977, while Srecko Katanec appeared 31 times between 1983 and 1990. He also won an Italian championship medal in 1991 with Sampdoria.

In truth, however, football is not a major passion in Slovenia, especially in Ljubljana where ice hockey dominates. Since independence, Maribor Bronik have threatened Olimpija's pre-eminence and it was in Maribor that the Slovenians made their competitive debut in international football against Italy. They were very unlucky not to beat the World Cup finalists that day, which saw Katanec make his farewell appearance.

THE FORMER SOVIET UNION

In 1992, the national team of the already defunct Soviet Union, playing under the banner of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS), was consigned to history. If not always remembered with affection, the teams from the Soviet era will always command respect.

After the Russian revolution in 1917, which gave birth to the Soviet Union, football came under the control of the state's Committee of Physical Culture and Sport. It meant, as the name suggests, that the game was thoroughly organised along lines that suited the new political masters. Sports clubs were founded for the workers of various organisations and within them a whole host of sports were catered for. The idea was that sport would help in the cultural emancipation of the population, a fundamental tenet of communism. Interestingly, in light of later events, the original idea was not to build athletes capable of taking on the world; that came later, in the 1950s. Football and other sports were used as a mechanism to build the character of individuals and train them in the benefits of working in a group, which was considered vital for the development of the country. In the meantime, the Soviet Union became an international recluse.

The main clubs in Moscow, which after the revolution had become the capital, were the Dynamo club, the Spartak club for the producers' cooperative (formed in 1922), the Torpedo club for workers in the automobile industry (1924), the Lokomotive club for the railway workers (1923) and the army club, known eventually as CSKA, formed in 1923. The same type of organisation was repeated over the whole country. The development of these clubs was important, because although the idea of general sports clubs was not new, having long traditions in the German gymnastic clubs, the Soviet Union was the first country to actively promote them, and the system within which they functioned served as a role model for numerous countries around the world.

Competition did creep into this highly structured system in the 1930s and in 1936 a national football league was formed. Right from the start, the clubs from Moscow dominated the competition, and it was not until Dynamo Kiev's win in 1961 that a club from outside the capital won the championship. Soviet sides did play in friendly matches whenever the occasion merited, but despite the increase in international competition in the rest of Europe, the Soviet Union remained aloof.

Quite how far they had developed became apparent when Dynamo Moscow toured Sweden and Great Britain in 1945 in a gesture of friendship and to celebrate the victory over fascism. IFK Norrköping were beaten 5-0, the matches against Chelsea and Glasgow Rangers ended in draws, Cardiff City were beaten 10-1, whilst in the final match, Arsenal were beaten 4-3 on a foggy day at Highbury. Dynamo were shown to be a methodical team and highly trained, if lacking in flair, and as the Soviet Union began to open up to the West, this type of approach was to become a familar sight. A team travelled to Finland for the 1952 Olympic Games, but after beating Bulgaria in the first round and drawing 5-5 with Yugoslavia in a remarkable game in Tampere, they lost the replay and disappeared from sight for a further two years.

Only in 1955 did the Soviet Federation start to organise a proper international fixture list. A tour was made of India and in August that year, in an historic match, West Germany, the world champions, travelled to Moscow and were beaten 3-2 in the Soviets' first meeting with a major Western power. The following year they won the gold medal in the Melbourne Olympic Games, but due to a very poor field, the title did not carry a great deal of weight. Hopes were high for the 1958 World Cup, the first time they had entered the world's premier tournament. With a good if unspectacular side, they dumped England out of the competition before losing to the hosts Sweden in the quarter-finals.

The most notable names in the side at the time were the captain Igor Netto, Valentin Ivanov, Nikita Simonyan and the brilliant Lev Yashin in goal. This was the basis of the side that won the first European Championship two years later, along with the talented Slava Metreveli and Viktor Ponedelnik. Having beaten Yugoslavia in the final of the 1956 Olympic Games, they consigned the poor Yugoslavs to yet another runners-up spot, this time by a score of 2-1 in Paris. This victory was to be the only major title ever won by the Soviet Union in its entire history.

With a remarkably stable side, which was perhaps to be expected from a country that took its sport so seriously, the Soviet Union did consistently well in the 1960s without ever shining, and it was this lack of extra sparkle that perhaps cost them the chance of more titles. They lost in the final of the 1964 European Championship to Spain, and again to West Germany in 1972, whilst reaching the semi-finals in between in 1968. Had the coin landed on the other side after the semi-final draw with Italy that year, they would have appeared in a remarkable four consecutive finals. Finishing as quarter-finalists in the 1962 World Cup and semi-finalists in England four years later further reinforced the belief that the Soviets just did not have what it took to win a tournament, and it should not be forgotten that none of the major powers took part in the first European Championship which they won.

Final standings for the Soviet Union

At club level, the 1960s saw the rise of teams from outside Moscow, especially from the Ukraine which was establishing itself as a major football base. Leading the challenge were Dynamo Kiev and also very successful were the top side from Georgia, Dynamo Tbilisi. They share with Kiev the honour of being the only Soviet sides to win a European club competition. Dynamo Moscow lost in the 1972 Cup Winners Cup final to Glasgow Rangers, but Kiev went one better in 1975 when they beat the Hungarians Ferencváros 3-0 in Basle. Dynamo Tbilisi won the same tournament six years later before a poor crowd in Dusseldorf against Carl Zeiss Jena. Five years after that, and once again in the Cup Winners Cup, Kiev won with an impressive 3-0 victory over Atlético Madrid in Lyon.

The European Cup and UEFA Cup were different stories altogether and the record in both dismal. Three semi-final appearances in the European Cup is a record similar to a country like Switzerland, whilst in the UEFA Cup, the furthest a Soviet side reached is the quarter-finals, and then only on three occasions. Why they performed so poorly, despite the capacity to generate huge crowds, is a mystery that can not be explained away with the same reasons as for the failure of the national side.

The 1970s was a curious time for Soviet football, failing to qualify as they did for both the 1974 and 1978 World Cups. In 1974 they refused to play Chile in the Estadio Nacional in Santiago which had been used as a prison after the coup there in 1973, and were forced to withdraw, whilst in 1978 they finished second in their group behind Hungary. But in 1972 the first real star of Soviet football, Oleg Blokhin, made his debut for the national side, and despite missing out in 1974 and 1978, he was able to display his talents on the world stage in 1982 in Spain and again four years later in Mexico. He will go down in history as the most capped player in the history of the Soviet side as well as their top scorer. Voted European Footballer of the Year in 1975, along with Lev Yashin he is probably the finest footballer his country has ever produced.

In the 1988 European Championships, the Soviets once again reached the final and once again found themselves playing a minor role next to the real stars of the show. In 1964 it was the Spain of Suárez, Amancio and Zoco. In 1972 it was the Germans of Beckenbauer, Netzer and Müller, whilst in 1988 it was as sidekicks to Gullit, Van Basten and Rijkaard of Holland. Never again as the Soviet Union, however, will they have the chance to prove that they can be the main event.

SPAIN

Spain are one of the giants of world football. Their league is one of the top half dozen in the world, and although they have never won the World Cup, the national team play to a consistently high standard which has seen them crowned European champions. The real strength, however, lies with the club sides, especially Real Madrid and Barcelona who have few rivals in the top echelons of European football. In the all-time rankings for European club competitions they stand first and second respectively with eight and seven titles won, and in the Estadio Bernabeu in Madrid and Camp Nou in Barcelona they have two of the biggest and best club stadia in the world.

Football first made an appearance in Spain in the Basque region in the north of the country in the 1890s. British mining engineers were responsible according to some sources, British sailors according to others, but the game soon spread through the country, especially to the cities of Madrid, Barcelona and Valencia. The first club formed was the Athletic Club de Bilbao in 1898 and to this day they retain the English spelling in their name. Later in the same year Real Madrid were formed by students in the capital, though the club was not formalised until four years later and did not attain the Royal (Real) prefix until 1920 when it was granted by King Alfonso XIII.

By 1910 most of the major present-day clubs had been formed, spurred on by the presence of a cup competition that was introduced in 1902. Until the formation of a league in 1929, the Cup was the only national competition in the country and the winners were regarded as the champions of Spain. Bilbao featured strongly in the intial competitions. A combined Athletic Bilbao and Bilbao FC team called Vizcaya won the initial tournament, whilst Athletic won the next two and lost in the final of the following two. The city soon saw its dominance challenged when first Real Madrid then Barcelona had dominant spells before the First World War - and they have not relinquished this pre-eminence since. Athletic Bilbao, Atlético Madrid, Valencia and to a lesser extent Sevilla have all challenged at one time or another, but the Real-Barcelona fixture remains the biggest of them all, compounded by the intense regional rivalry between Catalonia, in which Barcelona is located, and the capital city.

In 1913, nine years after Spain joined FIFA, the Real Federacion Española de Fútbol was formed, unifying all the regional organisations, but not until 1920 did it field a representative side. The programme of international matches remained light until well into the second half of the century even though the first signs were encouraging. Up until the outbreak of civil war in 1936, Spain's record was very good, and it included victories over some of Europe's stronger nations, most notably the 4-3 win in Madrid in 1929 over England. The Spaniards thus became the first nation outside of the British Isles to beat the English in a full international game. Star of that side was Ricardo Zamora, their goalkeeper, but Zamora could do nothing to help beat Spain's bogey team, Italy. In the 1924 and 1928 Olympics and in the 1934 World Cup, Spain's hopes were dashed each time by the Italians.

The combination of the Civil War and then the Second World War effectively stopped international football for close on ten years, although club football carried on with an interruption only in the years when the fighting in the Civil War was at its worst. It was in the early years of the 1940s that the league competition grew in stature. Introduced in 1929 along with professionalism, it grew from 10 clubs in its first few years to 16 by 1951. Political undertones helped reinforce the stature of the game. During the civil war, Catalonia, and Barcelona in particular, had been the main area of resistance to Franco's Fascist forces. Defeated, the Catalan people were banned from organising political meetings and the only place they could meet for such discussions was at football matches. The same was true for the Basques and other regions of Spain. The 1940s therefore were boom years for football.

The 1950s saw even more rapid growth as these rivalries intensified. Foreigners were brought in to help build winning teams, most notably Alfredo Di Stéfano at Real Madrid and later the great Hungarian trio of Kubala, Kocsis and Czibor at Barcelona, and a trend was started that holds true to this day. Over the years many great players have been tempted into Spanish football by the high wages and the level of competition on offer.

Naturally there was concern about the effect on local players and after the initial influx a ban was imposed that lasted from 1963 to 1973, although many players in the league at this time were from South America and were considered, like Di Stéfano, as naturalised Spaniards.

Once the gates were opened again in 1973 the big names of world football reappeared in Spain, amongst them Cruyff and Neeskens at Barcelona, Breitner and Netzer at Real, and Rep and Keita, the first winner of the African Footballer of the Year award, at Valencia. Only Athletic Bilbao and Real Sociedad, with their Basque-only rule, did not have any foreigners on their books. Since then players like Kempes, Maradona, Lineker, Schuster and Hugo Sanchez have all made their mark in the Spanish league.

The fifties belonged to one team in particular, Real Madrid. They wrote themselves into football folklore by winning the first five European Cups. But it was not just the fact that they won five in a row, a feat unlikely ever to be equalled; it was style in which they did it. Central to the side was Di Stéfano, a player many rate as the best of all time. He appeared in all five triumphs along with Francisco Gento and Jose Maria Zarraga. Gento was also in the side when Real won the Cup again in 1966, as well as appearing in two more, losing, finals.

Real's crowning glory came in in the 1960 final against Eintracht Frankfurt. By then the Hungarian Ferenc Puskás had joined them and he scored four goals that day, while Di Stéfano hit a hat-trick as Real thrashed Eintracht 7-3. Real were not the only Spanish winners in Europe in the 1960s. Barcelona won the initial Fairs Cup in 1960 and again in 1966. In between there were wins in the same competition for Valencia and Zaragoza, while Atletico Madrid won the Cup Winners Cup in 1962. To cap it all, the national side won the 1964 European Nations Cup. Chosen to host the final tournament after reaching the last four, they defeated a good Hungarian side 2-1 in the semi-final then and saw off the defending champions, the Soviet Union, by the same score in the final, inspired by the brilliant Luis Suarez.

From the mid-fifties until the late sixties it seemed the Spanish could do no wrong, but there then followed a strange slump in fortunes in the 1970s. If there had been a weakness in Spanish football, it was with the national team; the 1964 side apart, they achieved little. A major problem was that with such strong regional identities existing in Spain, the national side was poorly supported; a Catalan or a Basque considers himself just that, not 'Spanish'. Barcelona has only ever staged 15 internationals, just five of them at Camp Nou, and there have been none at all in the Catalan capital since 1987. As a centre of Basque nationalism, Bilbao has fared even worse, with only six internationals in all, none since 1967.

During the 1950s the Spanish had given little priority to the national side, a fact borne out by their elimination from both the 1954 and 1958 World Cup qualifiers at the hands of Turkey and Scotland respectively. Taken more seriously in the 1960s, the team qualified for both Chile and England but did not get past the first round in either. The ban on foreigners, designed to improve Spain's chances, seemed eventually to have the reverse effect. Failure to qualify for either the 1970 or 1974 World Cups was compounded by poor results at club level in the European competitions. Real's 1966 European Cup triumph was the last title won by a Spanish team until Barcelona won the Cup Winners Cup in 1979. The Spanish football association was persuaded to lift the ban in 1973 and although there was no tangible benefit at first, Spain have since clawed their way back up the international ladder.

To the end of the 1994-95 season

Real Madrid, Barcelona and Valencia all had their share of success in the 1980s but most disappointing for the Spaniards was their dreadful failure in the World Cup of 1982, when as hosts they were amongst the favourites. Seldom has a host nation fared so badly, and in five games they recorded only one victory. Two years later, with much the same side, they reached the final of the European Championships where they lost 2-0 to France in Paris. Spain have qualified for every World Cup since 1978 and have only missed out on two Euro finals, but they rarely progress beyond the last eight.

The club scene in Spain, however, is back to its best. Between 1961 and 1980, as Real Madrid won 14 championships and Barcelona just one, lack of competition was driving the standard of the league down. Since 1980, however, wins for Real Sociedad, Athletic Bilbao and Barcelona have all helped revive the championship. The four consecutive victories by Barcelona in the 1990s, under the leadership of Johan Cruyff, were especially welcome to the success-starved Catalans. Even better, they also managed to at last come out of the shadow of Real by winning the European Cup in 1992, the first win by a Spanish team for 26 years. Crowds are at their highest for some time and Spanish clubs provided most of the stars of the 1994 World Cup. The hope is that one day it will be native Spanish players returning home as world champions.

SWEDEN

Though second best to Denmark in the early years of the century, by the 1920s Sweden had taken over the role of the leading Scandinavian football nation, a role they have been hard pressed to hold onto since the rebirth of the Danes in the 1980s. If Sweden does still hold an edge it is in a stronger club scene, which has seen IFK Göteborg crowned as UEFA Cup winners on two occasions, the only Scandinavian club to achieve such a feat.

Gothenburg was the early centre of Swedish football and it remains the city that is most passionate about the game; not surprisingly it is also the most successful. The oldest club in existence today, Örgryte IS, was formed there in 1887, as was the game's first governing body, the Swedish Sports and Athletic Association in 1895. They organised a championship open only to Gothenburg clubs and in 1896 Örgryte became the first champions. In 1900 the tournament was opened up to clubs from Stockholm, in 1902 an unofficial national body based in Stockholm was formed and in 1904, a few months after Sweden joined FIFA as one of the founding members, the current Swedish football association was formed. They took over the running of the championship which continued as a knock-out competition until 1925 when a national league was instituted. These early years of competition were dominated by clubs from Gothenburg and Stockholm, especially Örgryte, IFK, GAIS, AIK and Djurgårdens. Although IFK Eskilstuna became the first provincial club to win the championship in 1921, it was not until the thirties and forties that other provincial teams such Helsingborg IF, IFK Norrköping and Malmö FF made their presence felt.

Sweden's national side first took the field in July 1908 and recorded the most impressive international debut to date, beating Norway 11-3 in Gothenburg. Until 1920, however, results were mixed. A heavy defeat against the English amateurs at the 1908 Olympic Games was followed by another first round exit in the 1912 tournament. Despite hosting the games the Swedes lost 4-3 to Holland and it was left to Denmark to fly the flag for Scandinavia. In the Antwerp games of 1920, the Dutch were responsible for Sweden's demise once again, this time in the quarter-finals. One thing the Swedes did not find difficult, however, was scoring goals. In the two games they played in the competition proper they scored 13! Seven were scored by Herbert Karlsson, who along with Karl Gustafsson was one of the early stars of the Swedish game.

Sweden has consistently produced good players, and few have been better than Sven Rydell, the Örgryte inside forward whose 49 goals in 43 games between 1923 and 1932 remains a Swedish record. Along with players like Harry and Albin Dahl, Knut Kroon, Per Kaufeldt and Sigfrid Lindberg in goal, the Swedes built a strong reputation for themselves in the 1920s and early 1930s. In 1924 they laid the Dutch ghost to rest, beating them 3-1 to clinch a deserved bronze medal at the Paris Olympics, but it was not until the 1934 World Cup that another major competition was entered.

At this time the Scandinavian Championship was the major feature of the fixture list, though curiously the 1924-29 tournament was won by Denmark and the 1929-32 edition by Norway. Not until the third edition (1933-36) did Sweden prove triumphant, when the national side was arguably inferior to the team of the 1920s and early 1930s. Sven Jonasson, Tore Keller and Eric Persson led the Swedes to fourth place in the 1938 World Cup, but this was achieved with a bye in the first round and a relatively easy quarter-final tie against Cuba.

The late 1940s saw Sweden at perhaps their best ever, boasting one of the most famous forward lines ever in football. Gunnar Gren, Gunnar Nordahl and Nils Liedholm formed the famous Gre-No-Li trio that was instrumental in winning the Swedes the gold medal at the 1948 Olympic Games in London. So impressed were the scouts of AC Milan that all three were signed up in 1949, and all three made a huge impact on the Italian game, between them scoring 329 goals for Milan alone over subsequent years.

Suddenly Swedish players were fashionable and over the years the exodus to the major European leagues has continued unabated. Of the side that won the Olympic title in such style, only two remained in Sweden for the 1950 World Cup qualifiers, but with Karl Palmer and Nacka Skoglund drafted into the side, even without the exiles - who were ineligible to play for their country due to the strict amateur rules of the Swedish association - they qualified and eventually finished third in the final tournament. On the way they defeated the defending champions Italy 3-2 in Sao Paulo, which was good news for the players, eight of whom were signed up by Italian teams!

The supply of class players continued, among them Kurt Hamrin, who also made his name in Italy, and so it was with some relief that the football association overturned its rule forbidding the use of foreign-based players in time for the 1958 World Cup, which Sweden had the honour of staging. A home side without all of these stars would have been unimaginable, and certainly Sweden would not have reached the final as they did without them. Apart from Agne Simonsson and Gren, who had returned from Italy, the other forwards, Liedholm, Hamrin and Skogland, were all still based there.

A common factor running through the triumphant sides of 1948, 1950 and 1958 was George Raynor, their English manager, but even he could do nothing to overcome their opponents in the final. Having surpassed themselves by beating the strong Soviets and West Germans in the quarter- and semi-finals, the Swedes now found themselves facing Brazil and were simply no match for the talented South Americans, succumbing 5-2 despite taking a third-minute lead. The defeat still meant, however, that the Swedes remain as one of only ten countries to have appeared in a World Cup Final, an honour in itself. Raynor remained as manager until Switzerland qualified for Chile at the Swedes' expense after a play-off between the two countries in Berlin, and the rest of the 1960s proved to be a big disappointment. Both the national and club sides did not find the new competitions that were springing up easy going.

The 1970s were far more successful, with qualification for three World Cups. In 1974 a side including Ralf Edström and Ove Kindvall, both of whom were based in Holland, Ronnie Hellström in goal and Bjorn Nordqvist in defence, reached the second round of the World Cup in West Germany, but they were outclassed by the Germans and the Poles and finished third in the group. Though they qualified for Argentina in 1978 and Italy in 1990, the Swedes lacked consistency. The 1992 European Championship finals saw them appear for the first time in seven attempts only because as hosts they were given a free passage. One of the few pillars of stability was

To the end of 1994 seoson for the Chompionship, 1995 for the Cup

Nordqvist, who between 1963 and 1978 made 115 appearances for his country. In 1978 he overtook the world record held by Bobby Moore, a position he held until he in turn was overtaken by, among others, Pat Jennings, Peter Shilton and Heinz Hermann.

At club level, Malmö FF somewhat surprisingly reached the final of the 1979 European Cup but lost to Nottingham Forest. Swedish clubs have never adopted full-time professionalism and virtually all the top names appear abroad, with Britain, Portugal, Holland, Belgium, Germany and Italy being the favoured destinations. IFK Göteborg did manage to go one better than Malmö by winning the UEFA Cup in 1982 and 1987 and lost to Barcelona in the semi-finals of the 1986 European Cup only after penalties, and all as a part-time side!

Sweden continues to produce quality players, but until full-time professionalism is introduced in the league, following the example of Denmark, clubs will not be able to hang on to the players they have nurtured. It is to the national team that the Swedish public looks for their greatest thrills, and this was never better illustrated than at the 1994 World Cup. Having reached the semi-finals of the European Championships two years earlier on home soil, the Swedes matched that in America in admirable fashion. With a forward line including Tomas Brolin, Martin Dahlin and Kennet Andersson, they were the top scorers in the tournament with 15 goals, and in goalkeeper Thomas Ravelli, their record cap-winner, they had one of the characters of the tournament. Having taken third place, the team returned home to a heroes' welcome.

SWITZERLAND

Though never actually a force to be reckoned with, the Swiss were useful competitors in the first half of the century, but as a small and on the whole affluent society, they struggled to keep pace with the larger and more successful European nations since. Only with the emergence of a talented generation of players in the 1990s has Swiss football been able to regain some of its lost pride.

The Swiss Football Association, formed in 1895, was one of the first on mainland Europe and over the years the Swiss have proved themselves adept in the organisational field. Noted for its neutrality and situated in central Europe, Switzerland, one of the founding members of FIFA, became one of the centres for world football when it was decided to locate the FIFA organisation in Zürich. Fifty years later in 1954, the founders of UEFA decided that Switzerland should also be home to their body and so located themselves in Berne.

Football is recorded as having been played in Switzerland as early as 1869 by English students at La Châtelaine College in Geneva, and in 1879 St Gallen, the oldest surviving club, was formed. As the names of some of the clubs like Grasshoppers and Young Boys suggest, the British influence was strong. Three years after the formation of the association a championship was instituted, and by this time the majority of the clubs still active today had been formed. The first competition was won by Grasshoppers after a play-off between the winners of the three regional leagues. This was the system used until the introduction of a single national league in 1934. Grasshoppers, Servette and Young Boys, representing Zürich, Geneva and Berne respectively, were amongst the most successful teams in the early years and remain so. There is, however, a strong rivalry between the cities, and in recent years FC Zurich, FC Basel and regional clubs like Neuchâtel Xamax have all experienced periods of success at the expense of the established clubs.

In 1905 a national side was fielded for the first time with a match against France in Paris. Defeat that day was to become a familar experience, though notable victories were occasionally scored on home territory. Even the emergence of the amazing Abegglen footballing family could not alter the overall poor record of the national side. Max and André Abegglen fetaured in the side for nearly two decades and between them they scored over 60 goals for their country. Although the overall results remained poor, the Swiss continually made their mark upon the major tournaments in the 1920s and 1930s. Max Abegglen inspired them to a silver medal in the 1924 Olympic Games in Paris, where they succumbed to the dazzling Uruguayans in the final. They also reached the quarter-finals of both the 1934 and 1938 World Cups. Their 4-2 victory over Germany in the first round in 1938, in which André, the younger Abegglen brother by seven years, scored twice, was particularly impressive.

The Swiss finished last in every Dr Gerö Cup that was played, in perhaps a truer indication of the level of the game, and were often on the end of some heavy defeats. Aside from the victory over Germany in the World Cup, their finest moment pre-war was the 3-2 victory over England a month before the German game. Responsible for the national side at the time was one of the key figures in Swiss football history, Karl Rappan. The inventor of the 'Swiss Bolt' system, Rappan instigated a major tactical innovation which saw the initial use of a free man in defence, along the lines of a sweeper. Under him the Swiss experienced an immediate rise in their fortunes after the war, and as their manager on and off until he retired in 1968, he was responsible for Switzerland's continued presence as a international force.

Helped by players like Hügi, Ballaman, Fatton and Bickel, Switzerland took part in four of the first five World Cups after the war. As hosts in 1954 they reached the quarter-finals before losing to Austria in one of the most bizarre games ever staged in the tournament. Three-nil up after 23 minutes, they eventually lost 7-5 with all of the goals being scored within an hour. The 1950, 1962 and 1966 tournaments all saw elimination in the first round, but not much more was expected of the team and in light of later achievements, reaching the final tournament was success in itself.

From 1966 to 1994, though always difficult opponents, the national side failed to reach the finals of either the World Cup or European Championships. The 1992 European Championship saw them come close to breaking the sequence, finishing a point behind Scotland after losing their final match against Romania in Bucharest, and two years later they made it to the World Cup in America. Under English coach Roy Hodgson they served notice of their intentions by beating Italy in the qualifiers, and in the finals they sensationally thrashed the impressive Romanians, 4-1. The German-based quartet of Stéphane Chapuisat, Ciriaco Sforza, Adrian Knup and Alain Sutter provided the backbone of the side as they went through to the second round only to come unstuck against Spain, losing 3-0.

To the end of the 1994-95 season

Swiss club football, however, still has a much lower profile. For an important international match it is not unusual to see the Wankdorf stadium full to capacity, but the league does not have the glamour of those in neighbouring countries, though it does boast professionalism. The European club tournaments have not been particularly happy hunting grounds; FC Zürich have reached the semi-final of the European Cup twice, but on neither occasion were they serious contenders to win the tournament.

TURKEY

Turkiye, as they would prefer to be known, are Europe's major under-achievers; there is a football revolution just waiting to happen. The interest is there, and there is an enormous amount of talent to be unearthed. With a population of over 55 million Turkey should be at the forefront of the European game. (The vast majority of Turkey is in fact in Asia, but with Istanbul, the major footballing city, located partly in Europe, the Turks have always looked to European countries for competition.) Due to a poor record in the past, however, they are usually listed as lower seeds and therefore drawn against the top sides in both the World Cup and European Championship. Qualification for either of these events will always be difficult until the duck is eventually broken.

Football first came to Turkey along with the British and a game is recorded in 1895 between English and Greek residents in Izmir. At this time, however, the foundations of the Ottoman Empire were crumbling and in an attempt to reverse the decline, the authorities were quick to stamp out any movement they perceived as a threat and football was regarded as just that. In one bizarre incident, a group of players were arrested after soldiers discovered shirts which were described as uniforms, a ball which they assumed was a cannon ball and a set of the rules in English which they took to be subversive literature!

In 1905 eight boys of the Galatasaray High School formed a team and they, along with Fenerbahçe, formed in 1907, and the oldest club of them all, Besiktas, formed in 1903, remain the top clubs of today. Until 1908 and the Young Turk Revolution, all clubs in Turkey operated in near secrecy. Seen as less of a threat by the new régime, the game enjoyed a brief period of growth. A league of sorts had been started in 1905 in Istanbul, but the Balkan Wars, the First World War, Civil War and then war with Greece put paid to any real efforts to promote the game until a republic with the present boundaries was declared in 1923.

As some semblance of peace was restored to the country, the Turkish Football Federation was formed later that year. Proper regional championships were started the following year with a view to staging a tournament to find the national champions at the end of the season, but the latter was only ever a regular occurrence in the late 1930s and early 1940s and the winners of the Istanbul league were regarded as the top club until the formation of the professional national league in 1959.

In 1923 the Turks took on Romania in Istanbul in their first international match, but it was not until the 1960s that any great prominence was given to the national side. One player perhaps more than any other was responsible for the increased awareness of the game: Lefter Kücükandonyadis, from the Greek quarter of Istanbul, was Turkey's first player of genuine international class, and from his first appearance in 1948 he helped change the fortunes of the game in his country.

Turkey had entered the 1924, 1928 and 1936 Olympic Games but were knocked out in the first round of each. During these years there had been a few wins against their Balkan neighbours, but the overall record was poor. It reached the stage that between 1932 and 1948 only three games were played. In 1948 fortunes changed as the Federation once more fielded a side. The quarter-finals of the 1948 Olympic Games in London were reached and the following year the Turks qualified for the World Cup finals in Brazil. In the light of subsequent failures to qualify, their withdrawal before the tournament got underway, due to the high expenses anticipated and the time needed to make the trip to Brazil, seems ridiculous, but four years later they were present in Switzerland for the 1954 tournament.

The situation was helped by the introduction of professionalism in 1951, and in June of that year they pulled off the first of a remarkable series of victories for which they became famous down the years when they beat West Germany 2-1 in Berlin. Admittedly the German game had not fully recovered from the war, but in qualifying for the 1954 World Cup they defeated Spain in Istanbul and drew 2-2 with them in a play-off in Rome, where they won the ensuing lots. They had beaten Switzerland in Berne in 1953 but on their return for the World Cup the following year, despite scoring seven against the South Koreans, they could not beat the Germans for a second time and bowed out of their sole World Cup Finals appearance after a play-off.

More good results were to follow, however. Portugal were beaten at home in 1955, whilst most impressive of all, and inspired by Lefter who scored two goals, the Turks ended Hungary's two-year unbeaten run with a 3-2 victory in Istanbul in 1956. Both Poland and Holland were defeated away from home before the end of the decade, and although not members of UEFA until 1962, Turkey were invited to take part in the initial European Championship and were unlucky to lose out to Romania in the first round on goal average. Alongside Lefter in what still stand out as the best teams Turkey has fielded were players such as Metin Otkay and Burhan Sargin who between them scored 47 goals for the national side. Since the mid-1960s, however, instead of building on these foundations the national team has declined. Heavy defeats at home in recent years by both Hungary and England have not helped matters.

To the end of the 1994-1995 season.
Not including winners pre-1959

With declining international fortunes, attention has focused on the very competitive national league. Although professionalism was legalised in 1951, it was not until eight years later that the regional leagues were replaced by a single national league. Galatasaray, Besiktas and Fenerbahçe have continued to be the leading clubs, but a unified structure has allowed provincial clubs as well as those from Izmir and Ankara to rise from obscurity. Trabzonspor, from the small town of Trabzon, have fared particularly well and along with the big three from Istanbul are part of an elite group which have managed to win the national league.

The 1960s saw the formation of many clubs in the smaller cities of Turkey, and as they gain more experience, they will undoubtedly challenge for honours as Trabzonspor have done. In the meantime, Turkey's main challenge for European club honours seems set to come from Istanbul. In 1989 Galatasaray reached the semi-finals of the European Cup, the best performance to date from a Turkish club. The question is how long will it be before one of them goes one further and reaches the final?

UKRAINE

Of all the former Soviet republics that now have their independence, it was always expected that Ukraine, along with Russia, would be the strongest. Dynamo Kiev were the most successful team in Soviet history with 13 league titles and 9 cup wins, and they were not the only Ukrainian team winning honours. Others included Shachter Donetsk, Dnepr Dnepropetrovsk, Zarja Lugansk, Karpati Lvov and Metalist Kharkov.

Of the 30 leading Soviet cap-winners, thirteen played their football in the Ukraine, and in Oleg Blokhin not only did the Ukraine have the Soviet Union's most capped player and record goalscorer, but also one of only two Soviet players ever to win the European Footballer of the Year award. The other, Igor Belanov, was himself a Ukrainian.

The Ukraine has had a history of changing borders and was not recognised as an independent country under that name before the 19th century. Its capital, Kiev, has always been an important city but has found itself part of Poland, the Soviet Union, and even, at one point, Lithuania. Ukraine became independent in 1991 and is one of the largest countries in Europe, with a population of 51 million. Hopes were high that it could make a big impact on European football, but progress has been disappointing.

Matters did not get off to a happy start when Russia inherited the Soviet Union's place in the 1994 World Cup qualifying round, the Ukrainians arguing that their status at least merited the chance to play-off for the World Cup berth. To compound their disappointment, many of the top Ukrainian stars who were allowed to play for Russia in the qualifiers as a special concession, elected to carry on playing for them afterwards. Ukraine therefore kicked off their 1996 European Championship campaign without the likes of Kanchelskis, Yuran, Onopko and Salenko, and in their first game lost embarrassingly at home to Lithuania.

Domestically, 1992 saw the first Ukrainian league and cup played, and although Dynamo Kiev won neither, they have retained their status as the country's top club. But crowds are poor, and with heavy industry in the big cities, for so long the lifeblood of football clubs, being eroded, the Ukraine faces a difficult task living up to its glorious past on the football field, when Dynamo Kiev were one of the most feared teams in Europe. Since their debut in Europe under the Ukrainian banner, the clubs' performances have been disappointing. Dynamo did beat Barcelona 3-1 at home in the 1994 European Cup, but they lost the return 4-1, while other clubs have suffered embarrassing defeats in the early rounds against opposition from the likes of Norway and Ireland.

WALES

Unlike England, Scotland and Northern Ireland, the other trio in the United Kingdom quartet, in Wales football is not the national sport. The national stadium is Cardiff Arms Park, the home of the Welsh Rugby Football Union, and until recent times at least, the oval ball has far outstripped the round one in popularity. Since the 1980s, as rugby has declined, football has made progress, albeit without managing to shake off Wales' image as 'the nearly men'. So often they have had qualification for the World Cup or European Championship finals within their grasp, but with the exception of the 1958 World Cup it has always slipped away.

North Wales has always been regarded as being more devoted to football than the south, the heartland of rugby, and it was there that Welsh football started. A club called Druids, the first club in the country and based in Ruabon near Wrexham, were formed at some point before 1875, when the oldest club still in existence, Wrexham AFC, were formed. The following year, also in Wrexham, the Football Association of Wales was instituted, three months after a match between a Scottish and Welsh team had taken place in Glasgow. Wrexham was naturally the venue for the return game the following year, and although games against both Ireland and England followed, it was not until 1894 that Wales played in the south, when they met Ireland in Swansea; and it was a further two years before Cardiff was considered.

Northern domination in these early years was complete. The Welsh Cup was introduced in 1878 and until 1912 the north produced all of the winners. The major clubs of the time, Druids, Wrexham, Bangor City, Oswestry and Chirk, however, all had to face up to the challenge that was rising in the south, especially from Cardiff City, Swansea Town, as they were then known, and Newport County. As the majority of the population lived in South Wales, this was an inevitable trend.

The Cup has always been the premier event in Welsh football as there has never been a proper league in force. In the 1920s Wrexham, Cardiff, Swansea and Newport all joined the English league, and with the exception of Newport who folded in the 1980s, they remain there today. A Welsh national league was started in 1993, with the winners qualifying for Europe, but none of the three professional clubs joined and indeed neither did most of the English-based semi-professional teams like Merthyr Tydfil. All of them preferred to take their chances of qualifying for Europe via the Welsh Cup.

It was actually in the English version, the FA Cup, that Cardiff enjoyed their most famous triumph, in 1927 when they defeated Arsenal 1-0 at Wembley. But apart from Cardiff in the 1920s, Welsh clubs have had a relatively low profile in the English league, generally languishing in its lower echelons. But it would seem that they prefer to stay in England, in the hope of emulating the rise of Swansea in the 1980s. Under the coaching of John Toshack they rose from the Fourth Division to the First in quick succession, but when he left for Spain they slid all the way back down again, where they have remained ever since.

Despite this low profile, Wales has produced some world class players. The first of these was the great Manchester City and Manchester United winger Billy Meredith, who played for Wales when he was 46 in 1920, some 25 years after he made his debut. This remains a world record to this day. Unfortunately for him, Wales' fixture list was composed entirely of Home International Championship games in these years. Not until the 1933 match with France in Paris did Wales play a foreign opponent. Had they done so when Meredith was playing he could have doubled his 48 caps, but this was still a remarkable figure for the time.

Success in these championships for both Meredith and Wales was not easy to come by, but they won their first title in 1907 and followed this up with victory in 1920, a fitting tribute to the retiring Meredith. The 1920 victory was the first of six during the 1920s and '30s, five of them outright. Although England won on seven occasions over the same period, only three of them were outright victories, a testament to the fact that the inter-war period was perhaps the most successful in the history of the game in Wales.

The national side left the borders of the British Isles for only the second time in 1939 for another match in Paris, but after the war a more concerted effort was made to take on opponents from abroad. After failing to qualify for the 1950 and 1954 World Cups, the qualifiers for which doubled up as matches in the Home International Championship, Wales somewhat fortuitously qualified for the tournament in Sweden in 1958 by beating Israel in a play-off. Czechoslovakia had come first in Wales' group, but when Israel were ordered to play-off for a place after all of their opponents had withdrawn, Wales were the lucky winners of the lottery.

Once in Sweden they progressed further than either Scotland or England, coming second in their group behind the hosts. In the quarter-finals the Welsh were rather unlucky to face Brazil. They gave the South Americans their hardest match in the competition, with Kelsey particularly brilliant in goal. The others stars of that that side were Ivor Allchurch, Trevor Ford and the great John Charles who found so much fame with Juventus in Italy.

To the end of the 1994-1995 season

The national side has been the main focus of attention in Welsh football, but since the 1958 World Cup the team have steadily built up their 'nearly men' reputation. In the 1976 European Championships they won their qualifying group but fell in the quarter-finals to Yugoslavia and thus missed out on the final tournament. They had reason reason to curse the Yugoslavs again in 1984 when they came within a minute of qualifying for the finals in France but were cruelly denied. In the World Cup it has been much the same story, especially since 1978 when Scotland qualified at Wales' expense thanks to a dubious penalty decision. In 1982 the Welsh lost out on goal difference to Czechoslovakia, and in 1986 they were again denied at the death by a Scottish penalty. In 1994 they missed out on the finals in America by a whisker, missing a vital penalty against Romania in a match they needed to win but eventually lost 2-1. These failures have meant that a fine generation of footballers has missed out on playing on the world's greatest stage. John Toshack, Ian Rush, Mark Hughes and Neville Southall would all have graced such a stage, and the Welsh are now hoping that Ryan Giggs, who turned down England to represent Wales, will not be similarly denied.

YUGOSLAVIA

Of the four Eastern bloc countries that have broken up since the fall of communism, Yugoslavia is the only name that survives to fight another day on the football field. But it is a much diminished state after its violent disintegration. Having once encompassed Slovenia, Croatia, Macedonia, Bosnia-Hercegovina, Montenegro, Vojvodina, Kosovo and Serbia, it now consists of only the last four. One of the first indications that such a collapse might happen came in the league games between Red Star Belgrade and Dinamo Zagreb in the years leading up to the civil war. These matches were constantly marred by fierce fighting between supporters of the Serbian Red Star and Croatian Dinamo, as the old nationalist tensions surfaced.

It proved to be the end of the road for a country loved the world over for its football. In the 1960s, the phrase 'often the bridesmaid but never the bride' summed up Yugoslavia's habit of finishing as runners-up rather than winners, but over the years they have dazzled the world with some beautiful football played by some of the world's most skilful players. Out of the bitterness of the civil war, football has returned, and in Croatia it is flourishing, but it is unlikely now that the national team of Yugoslavia will ever win that elusive title. Thrown out of the 1992 European Championships after qualifying, Yugoslavia were banned from international football until the end of 1994, and when they do make a return to competition one can only hope that they will not be drawn in the same group as any of their former territories.

As in all of the Balkan nations, the development of the game was held up by the turbulent nature of the region at the beginning of the century. Yugoslavia did not exist as a state until after the First World War and it is to this pre-war situation that the country has returned. Split, the Adriatic seaport in Croatia, saw the first club when Hajduk Split were formed in 1911, named after local fighters who had resisted the Ottoman Empire in the previous century. It was eleven years before they could take part in a proper league. An association for the newly-formed state was founded in 1919 and a national league started four years later. The standard of the game was not particularly high and many of the clubs that took part in the new competition no longer exist.

In 1920 the Yugoslavs took on another newly-formed country, Czechoslovakia, in the Antwerp Olympic Games, but the difference in experience told as they lost 7-0. A 4-2 defeat at the hands of Egypt in the consolation tournament did little to raise spirits and it was not until the late 1920s that the team began to perform better. In the 1924 Olympic Games, Uruguay inflicted another 7-0 defeat on them, whilst in 1928 an inexperienced Portugal side made sure that it was three first round exits in a row in the the world's premier football tournament of the time. The 1930 World Cup saw the first signs of development. As one of only four European countries to make the trip to Uruguay, Yugoslavia did commendably well to reach the semi-finals, but although the victory over Brazil looks good on paper, the Brazilians were not performing well at the time and were certainly not of the same calibre as the sides after the war. That Yugoslavia's success in Montevideo was a flash in the pan was proved by their failure to qualify for both the 1934 and 1938 tournaments, after defeats by Romania and Poland respectively.

In the early 1930s, the Balkan Cup provided much of the international interest and Yugoslavia's record was generally good, coming second in the first three editions and winning the fourth in 1934. It was not until after the Second World War that the Yugoslavs really began to make progress and move ahead of their Balkan neighbours. The war had once again caused a rift in the country as a German-backed government was installed in Croatia. A Croatian team was even able to travel widely during the war years and play international matches against Germany and her allies.

As a communist state, Yugoslavia, reunited again, could have been expected to go the same way as all the other Eastern bloc countries, but like their president, Tito, in his politics, Yugoslav football followed a peculiarly independent line. In fact they could perhaps have done with some of the teamwork so renowned of the communist countries, for despite producing players with outstanding skill, the main criticism levelled was one of inconsistency, and it was this that led to so many runner-up positions.

After the war, club football was completely reorganised along the lines of that in the Soviet Union. In 1945 Gradanski Zagreb, the first ever champions, and their rivals HASK formed the basis of the Dinamo club that was to become a dominant power, whilst in Belgrade, BSK, champions on five occasions in the 1930s and along with Hajduk the oldest club in the country, were reorganised as OFK. A new army team called Partizan were formed in 1945 whilst perhaps the most famous team of them all, Crvena Zvezda or Red Star, were formed as the University club in the same year. These five clubs have dominated the league, and the new cup competition introduced in 1947, ever since.

The standard was quick to improve, though it was mainly for the achievements of the national side that the Yugoslavs became famous. As an 'amateur' country they entered the 1948 Olympic Games with their full international side, and by finishing as runners-up started a remarkable sequence. In four consecutive Olympic tournaments, the Yugoslav team appeared in the final. Hungary beat them 2-0 in Helsinki in the 1952 final, the Soviet Union won 1-0 in 1956 in Melbourne before at last, in the 1960 Rome Olympics, the gold medal was won. Their opponents that day were poor Denmark, who in turn collected their third silver medal after having lost in the 1908 and 1912 finals. That win was the only title at senior level to be won by the national side, but unfortunately it carries little weight due to the lack of any Western-based professionals in the tournament. Two months previously in a similarly depleted first European Championship, Yugoslavia attained their customary second place after losing 2-1 in the final to the Soviet Union in Paris, having beaten both Portugal and France along the way.

To the end of the 1994-95 season.

Clubs in bold remain under the banner of Yugoslavia.

In the World Cup the habit was to reach the quarter-finals before bowing out to West Germany. This happened in both 1954 and 1958, but when they were paired with the Germans in the quarter-finals for the third successive tournament, in 1962 in Chile, it was third time lucky and they won 1-0. Czechoslovakia were generally considered the weaker of the two teams in the semi-finals, but once again a lack of consistency let Yugoslavia down as they lost 3-1 in Viña del Mar and had to settle for fourth place after losing the third place play-off to the hosts.

Many fine players represented Yugoslavia in these post-war years. Stejpan Bobek was instrumental in helping the team reach the first two Olympic finals, and the 38 goals he scored between 1946 and 1956 remains a record. Branco Zebec, a team-mate of Bobek for most of those years, was another great player and after he retired in 1961, his 65 caps remained a record for over 10 years until broken by Dragan Dzajic. The two most important goalscorers who took over the role vacated by Bobek were Milan Galic and Bora Kostic, the former falling just one short of his predecessor's goal tally. Both were key elements in both the Olympic triumph of 1960 and the second place in the European Championship of that year. The outstanding player of the time though was Dragoslav Sekularac, and it was he who inspired his team to fourth place in the World Cup in Chile.

The mid-1960s were not a very happy time for the national side and they did not make the journey to England for the 1966 World Cup. Two years later, though, they defeated the world champions England in the semi-finals of the European Championship to reach yet another final. Surprise, surprise, it ended in defeat, though it took the hosts Italy two games to seal the victory. The star of this side was Dzajic, the most capped Yugoslav of all time, but despite his presence in the side until the late 1970s Yugoslavia's form continued to baffle.

In 1970, for the second consecutive World Cup, the team failed to qualify. When they did in 1974, they were very disappointing despite reaching the second round and beating Zaire 9-0. The European Championships has always been a different story. They have never finished lower than second in their qualifying group and in 1976 had a glorious opportunity to win the tournament when it was staged in Yugoslavia. Home advantage could not be made to count and they lost to the powerful West Germany in the semi-final.

It is sad that just as the country was mounting a serious challenge for honours once again, it should have fallen apart to wreck these hopes. The 1991 win by Red Star in the European Cup, though not Yugoslavia's first in a European competition, was the first in the premier event. Despite a dreadful final, they had played some scintillating football to get that far and once again Yugoslav footballers have become the fashion. For years they had been in high demand with clubs in the West, but the federation was always able to control the exodus, in most cases not allowing them to leave until they were past their prime. The team which won the 1987 World Youth Championship contained some of the most talented players in Yugoslavia's history and it was on these that the upsurge in fortunes in the late eighties and early nineties was based. Most of them, however, were Croatians and they jumped ship at the first available opportunity. Under different circumstances, it could have been Yugoslavia rather than Denmark who emerged as European champions in 1992.

In 1992 the recognition of both Slovenia and Croatia as separate states saw both organising their first championship, with Macedonia following suit the year after. The withdrawal of the Croatian clubs effectively ended the Yugoslav championship in any recognisable form, and with the withdrawal of the Bosnian teams it has become very much a Serbian affair. The final ignominy for Yugoslav football came with the forced withdrawal of the national side from the 1992 European Championship finals. It marked a sad end to a proud footballing history at a time when Yugoslav football was perhaps at its strongest.

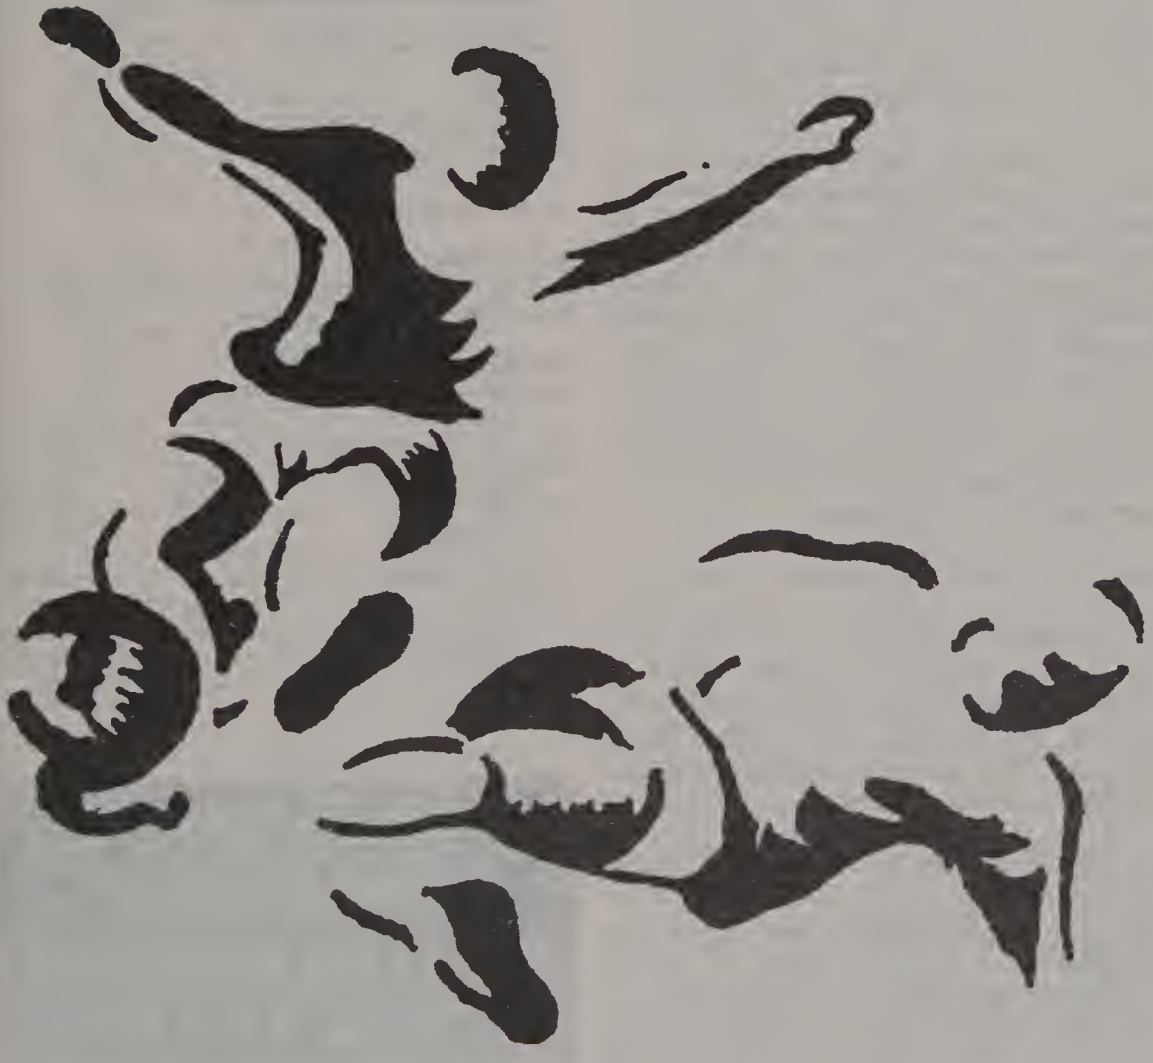
SOUTH AMERICA



WORLD SOCCER

Known for many years in football as the 'new world', South America is now very much part of the establishment of world football. CONMEBOL is the oldest continental confederation, having been in existence almost 40 years longer than UEFA, and of its ten members, three have been crowned world champions.

Through the organisation of the South American Championships, CONMEBOL has played a crucial role in the development of the game on the continent. Aside from the big three of Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay, until the last twenty years or so, almost all of the competitive matches played by the other seven countries were in CONMEBOL-sponsored tournaments. At club level, it organises both the Copa Libertadores as well as the recently introduced Super Copa and CONMEBOL Cup.

The Copa Libertadores is reserved for the champions and runners-up in each of the ten leagues and has been played since 1960. The Super Copa, introduced in 1988, is for all of the previous winners of the Copa Libertadores, whilst the CONMEBOL Cup, first played for in 1992, is, like the UEFA Cup and CAF Cup, for the best of the rest. In this tournament countries are ranked according to their past record and size. As a result Brazil has four places, Argentina three, Uruguay two, each of the others just one. The other major tournament is the Recopa, played between the winners of the Copa Libertadores and the Super Copa. Any excuse for a game!

South America covers a very large area, of which Brazil and Argentina occupy a sizeable proportion. Due to trading and cultural links with the east coast of America and Europe, the countries on the Atlantic coastline have been more prosperous than their neighbours who border on the Pacific, and this has helped make football in Brazil, Uruguay and Argentina more successful than in Chile, Peru, Paraguay, Bolivia or Ecuador.

In the other two members of CONMEBOL, Colombia and Venezuela, local factors have helped retard the growth of the game. In Venezuela, football is far less popular than a host of imported American sports such as baseball, whilst Colombia, who are prone to flout the regulations of FIFA, have often found themselves ostracised from the world game. The presence of the drug cartels has not helped the situation there either. Though situated in South America, Guyana and Surinam are members of CONCACAF, whilst French Guiana is affiliated to the French Football Federation.

Nine World Cup victories are testament to the strength of the national sides in South America, but club football seems to be in a permanent state of crisis. The deteriorating economic state of the continent has meant a constant flow of players to Europe, as clubs try to balance their books and players look for a secure living. Until the clubs are in a position to keep their players, perhaps even compete with the Europeans in the transfer market, the situation is unlikely to improve.

The basis is there, however. The biggest clubs can draw on large support, and the idea of a super league for the top twenty or so clubs is rapidly gaining momentum. Should that happen, who knows, we may indeed witness European players moving to South America to play their football for a change.

THE SOUTH AMERICAN CHAMPIONSHIP

The South American Championship is now the longest running tournament in world football, and has been since the demise of the British International Championship in 1984. Played by the national teams of the ten members of CONMEBOL, the Copa America, as it has been known since the 1975 edition, predates its European counterpart by nearly fifty years, and played a crucial part in facilitating the spread of football in South America.

Between 1910 and 1959 it was played on average once every two years, but with the ever increasing fixture list, as well as the constant flow of players to Europe, it became more difficult to organise on such a regular basis. Between 1959 and 1987 it was held just five times, and there was a period of eight years in the late 1960s and early 1970s when it was not played at all. Since 1987, however, it has reverted back to the two-year formula.

Given that South America is dominated by Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay, one would expect the honours to have been evenly divided between these 'Big Three.' This has not been the case, however. Since 1922, Brazil have won the tournament on only two occasions, in 1959 and 1989. As there have been 30 tournaments played in this time, it can be seen just how poor their record is. Instead, Argentina and Uruguay have dominated the competition, between them winning 28 of the 37 editions played.

The first South American Championship took place in 1910. Though not an official competition, taking place as it did six years before the founding of CONMEBOL, it was acclaimed as such by the newspapers of the time. With Montevideo just over the River Plate from Buenos Aires, matches between Argentina and Uruguay in the Lipton and Newton Cups had been a regular feature for over five years. As transport was rapidly improving, both countries looked further afield for opposition. The opening of the Trans-Andine Railway between Argentina and Chile encouraged the Argentines to organise a tournament involving themselves, Uruguay, Brazil and Chile. Brazil withdrew, but at the end of May 1910 the tournament got underway, Uruguay defeating Chile, who had no experience of international football at all, 3-0 on the grounds of the Gimnasia club at Palermo in Buenos Aires. To Peñarol's Jose Piendibene, the star of Uruguayan football at that time, fell the honour of scoring the first goal in the championship's history.

A week later Argentina defeated the Chileans with even greater ease, setting up what over the years was to become the familar sight of Uruguay playing Argentina on the final day to decide the championship. Nearly 40,000 spectators turned up to see the game, such was the interest, and the occasion showed that some things never change in football. Excited fans burned down one of the stands at Gimnasia's ground and there were reports of shootings. The match was abandoned before it had even started, postponed until the following day and relocated to Racing Club's ground. There a much smaller crowd of 8,000, strictly controlled by the police, saw Argentina crowned as the first unofficial champions of South America. Leading 2-0 at half-time, they completely dominated the game and won 4-1.

The second tournament is also listed as an unofficial event, even though during it CONMEBOL was founded. Played in 1916 to celebrate Argentina's centenary as an independent nation, it saw Uruguay gain revenge for the defeat of six years previously. In the entire history of the championship there have only ever been six proper final ties, in 1975, 1979, 1983, 1987, 1993 and 1995. All the other tournaments were on a league basis. However, it was a practice of the organisers to try an predict which game would be the decider and leave that fixture until last! This became more complicated as more countries entered the tournament, and over the years the 'deciding game' has often occurred early on in the tournament.

Uruguay were the early force in the championship, winning six of the first 11 series, and they have carried on winning with surprising regularity ever since. Argentina, however, really came into their own from the mid 1920s until the end of the 1950s, winning 11 of 18. Brazil's record is lamentable. They have never won the championship outside their own country and have only won four overall. There is a small element of truth in the theory that they do not take the championship as seriously as the other countries, in that they have only staged the tournament on four occasions while there have been eight in Argentina, six in Uruguay, six in Chile and five in Peru. Their lack of success is better explained, though, by the fact that the majority of the championships were played before the 1960s, when the Brazilians were not as strong as either Argentina or Uruguay. Conversely, it was Brazil's misfortune that when they were at their best, from the mid 1950s, there were not that many championships played!

The 1960s saw a decline in the championship as the Copa Libertadores became an ever more popular tournament, and this, combined with an increased desire of the Big Three to play more lucrative friendlies in Europe, nearly killed off the competition for good. Bolivia were chosen to host the 1963 tournament and remarkably won it; but the Argentine and Brazilian selections, while by no means weak sides, were not full strength teams.

An eight-year gap after the 1967 edition, the longest in the championship's history, was followed by the introduction of a new format for 1975. Three qualifying groups were played, and for the first time the championship was not held in a single country. Instead, a home and away system was used to find the three qualifiers for the semi-finals, who were joined there by the previous year's winners. Peru and Paraguay seemed to adapt well to this new system as they carried off the title in 1975 and 1979 respectively. For both, it was only their second ever series win.

The 1975 edition was the first to attract the full complement of ten CONMEBOL members, a difficult number to work with, hence the bye to the semi-finals for the holders. In 1987 the same format was kept but the tournament was held in a single country, Argentina; it was not a satisfactory arrangement and in 1989 two groups of five were used, the top two in each group qualifying for a final round played on a league basis. This tournament provided Brazil with their first win in forty years, whilst in 1991, Argentina won for the first time in 32 years.

The 1993 tournament, held in Ecuador, was notable for the fact that both Mexico and the United States were invited to take part. The format was changed again so that there were three groups of four from which eight proceeded to the knock-out stage. The Mexicans made it all the way to the final, only to lose against Argentina. For the 1995 edition, CONMEBOL even tried to persuade first Spain and then Italy to take part! Thankfully, they declined, thus maintaining the regional integrity of the tournament.

THE PAN-AMERICAN CHAMPIONSHIPS

The Confederación Panamericana de Football was formed in 1946 in Barranquilla, Colombia, in an attempt to unite all of the countries of the Americas. The motivation was more from the states of Central and North America in a bid to be associated with the more famous countries in South America. The body did not serve a particularly useful function aside from organising three championships before disappearing in the 1960s. The three tournaments do, however, represent the only continent-wide championships for the Americas, given that the football tournament of the Pan American Games is only open to amateurs, in a continent where professionalism is widespread.

THE ATLANTIC CUP

The Atlantic Cup is an occasional series played between those countries which border the Atlantic Ocean. Of all the minor tournaments played in South America, this was the most important because it involved all the Big Three, Brazil, Argentina and Uruguay. Though not strictly an Atlantic nation, Paraguay were invited to take part in the second and third editions due to their proximity to the other three nations.

THE LIPTON AND NEWTON CUPS

Donated by the English tea baron, Sir Thomas Lipton, the Lipton Cup was the first regular tournament outside of the British Isles, and was contested between the national sides of Argentina and Uruguay. From 1905 until 1927 it was held on a regular basis, but since 1937 it has been played for on only eight occasions, as the fixture list of both countries has grown.

The Newton Cup, named after Richard Newton, a famous English settler in the mid-1800s, was introduced a year after the Lipton Cup. It too was contested by the national sides of Argentina and Uruguay, and like the Lipton Cup it was a regular event until the late 1920s. Since 1937 it has been played for on eight occasions.

Five other trophies have been contested between Argentina and Uruguay. From 1908 until 1923, both the Argentine and Uruguayan Ministries of Education presented a trophy; in 1913, in honour of Argentine president Roque Saenz Peña, a one-off tournament was played for a trophy bearing his name; and on four occasions in the 1930s and 1940s, the two sides met in matches played for the Copa Dr Hector Gomez and the Copa Juan Mignaburu.

OTHER SOUTH AMERICAN TOURNAMENTS

Of all the other irregular tournaments between South American countries, the most notable involve Chile and Paraguay. Chile have played in the Carlos Dittborn Cup against Argentina, the Bernardo O'Higgins Cup against Brazil, and the Juan Pinto Durán Cup against Uruguay. Paraguay have also played in the Rosa Chevallier Boutell Cup against Argentina, the Oswaldo Cruz Cup against Brazil, and the Artigas Cup against Uruguay. Other tournaments include the Pacific Cup between Chile and Peru and the Roque Gomez Peña Cup between Peru and Argentina. The least known perhaps is the Paz del Chaco Cup between Bolivia and Paraguay, played to celebrate the resolution of a border dispute between the two countries.

THE FOOTBALL TOURNAMENT OF THE PAN-AMERICAN GAMES

Open to all the countries of North, South and Central America, this tournament is for amateurs only and is only part of a much bigger tournament involving all sports. Despite them only sending amateur selections, it has still been dominated by countries from the south.

SOUTH AMERICAN CLUB COMPETITIONS

The Copa Libertadores de América is the premier South American club event. Prior to its inception in 1960, there had been no continent-wide tournament organised by CONMEBOL. A still-born Campeonato Sudamericano de Campeones, organised by Colo Colo in Chile in 1948 and won by Vasco da Gama, attracted the champion teams from all but Colombia, Venezuela and Paraguay, but it was a financial disaster and was not repeated the following year. The success of the European Cup persuaded CONMEBOL to give the idea another try, and at a meeting in Brazil in 1958 the idea was approved in principle. That same year Henri Delaunay, the general secretary of UEFA, proposed an annual meeting between the winners of the European Cup and the winners of a South American tournament. The prospect of a World Club Championship was very appealing to the top clubs, and it was this more than anything else that got the idea off the ground.

The first series was organised in 1960, with seven of the continent's champions taking part. Missing were those of Ecuador, Peru and Venezuela. For the second tournament the following year, all bar the Venezuelans entered, but despite a weak club scene there, by 1964 they found the lure of the competition too hard to resist and entered for the first time.

The Copa Libertadores has had a rich and varied history and has not been without its moments of high drama. It has always been dominated by clubs from around the River Plate, and as in the South American Championship, Brazil's record is not very impressive. Argentina's is far and away the best, with twice as many wins as its nearest rival Uruguay, and in Independiente the Argentines have a team which has won it seven times, the same number as Brazil overall. There have been winners from six of the 10 South American confederations, and only Peru, Ecuador, Bolivia and Venezuela have yet to win, though the first two have been represented in the final on one occasion each.

The first two tournaments were played on a knock-out basis with home and away legs in each tie, including the final. Although the format of the earlier rounds has varied over the years, the final itself has always been played over two legs and is decided on a points basis, with goal difference only counting if the play-off has not produced a winner. Penalties have recently been introduced instead of the play-off.

The first two series were fairly low-key and both won by Peñarol. In 1960 the Uruguayan champions beat Olimpia of Paraguay in the final, the decisive goal coming from Alberto Spencer, their Ecuadoran forward. He remains the all-time top scorer in the Copa Libertadores with 54 goals, 50 for Peñarol and four for Barcelona of Guayaquil. In 1961 Peñarol beat Palmeiras of Brazil, and again Spencer scored the decisive goal. The following year they appeared in their third consecutive final, but this time faced Pelé and his Santos team. They lost, and it was Santos who really gave the competition the boost it needed. Playing some of the best football the Copa Libertadores has ever seen, they retained their title the following year.

Santos' matches with Benfica and Milan in the World Club Championship also stirred up interest in the Copa Libertadores, and in 1966 it was decided to increase the eligibility to the champions and runners-up of each of the 10 nations. The knock-out system had been replaced in 1962 by three first round groups from which the top side in each qualified for the semi-finals; they were joined there by the previous year's winners. The increase in entrants in 1966 meant a huge number of games in the first round and Brazil withdrew their clubs in protest until 1968 and again from 1969 to 1970. Only when the first round was reorganised into five groups of four did they enter again.

After Santos relinquished their hold, the dominant force were the clubs from Argentina, most notably Independiente and Estudiantes. The latter, from the town of La Plata just south of Buenos Aires, became especially notorious for their rough tactics and gamesmanship. Winners for three successive years, based on one championship victory in 1967, their coach Osvaldo Zubeldia raised his team from an ordinary one to a winning combination by using tactics which found them no favour either among their South American or European opponents. Defensively almost impenetrable, Estudiantes used to goad the opposition into being sent off by a whole host of dirty tricks, and it worked. Unfortunately for the Copa Libertadores, after the positive image put across by Santos, Estudiantes undid most of the good work, especially with their displays in the World Club Championship.

Though never quite in the same league, Independiente did not do much to improve the image of the tournament with their four straight wins in the first half of the 1970s. Once again teamwork proved to be the key rather than the outstanding brilliance of a few players. Independiente, not as successful as either River Plate or Boca Juniors at home, remain the most successful club in the history of the tournament with seven wins. Boca Juniors eventually won in 1977 and again in 1978, but the second of those victories heralded a general decline in Argentina's dominance. Between Boca's final defeat by Santos in 1963 and their final defeat against Olimpia in 1979, an Argentine club appeared in all 17 finals played, winning 12 of them.

In 1979 Olimpia from Paraguay became the first club from one of the so-called smaller nations to win the title, and they repeated their success in 1990. The tournament became more even in its distribution, and in 1989, 1990 and 1991 the finals were notable for the absence of teams from Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay, the longest period in which none of their clubs made a final appearance.

In 1988 the structure of the tournament was changed yet again. The first round formula of five groups of four was kept, but instead of only one club qualifying to make up two semi-final groups of three with the previous years winners, as had been the format since 1971, the top two now went forward and the semi-final group system was replaced by a knock-out competition. The following year, the quite ridiculous system of three teams from the first round groups qualifying was introduced, to make the numbers up to a workable 16 teams for the knock-out stage. It means that sixty games are played to eliminate just five teams!

The last few years have seen a proliferation of club tournaments in South America. In 1988 the South American Super Copa was introduced. Played between former winners of the Copa Libertadores it was initially dismissed as just another excuse for a game, but it has the advantage that only the continent's top sides are included. Though it falls short of being a South American super league, the desperate financial position of many of the top sides may well see the Super Copa take over as the number one tournament on the continent, and it may yet progress from a knock-out tournament to one based on a league format.

Though the top sides from Argentina and Uruguay are well represented in the Super Copa, Brazilian teams are not. Of the big Rio de Janeiro clubs only Flamengo have won the Copa Libertadores, whilst from the São Paulo league only São Paulo FC and Santos are eligible to take part. The only other Brazilian clubs to have won the Copa Libertadores are Grêmio from Pôrto Alegre and Cruzeiro from Belo Horizonte.

With the Super Copa has come the Recopa, a play-off between the winners of the Copa Libertadores and the Super Copa. In 1993, as São Paulo FC had won both, the winners of South America's third competition, the CONMEBOL Cup, were invited to take part! The CONMEBOL Cup could be the most interesting development in South American club football since 1960, even though the first few editions were plagued by indifference. It is heavily weighted in favour of the 'Big Three', thus giving some of the larger clubs on the continent an outlet largely denied them at present.

A major problem for the Copa Libertadores over the years has been the movement of the top South American players to Europe. The tournament has undoubtedly lost some of the glamour of the early years, when the likes of Pelé were a regular feature. The irony of Argentinos Juniors' win in 1985 was that it was achieved with the money obtained from the sale of Diego Maradona, who in all his time at the club never appeared in the competition with them.

Another growing problem has been the ever-expanding fixture lists of clubs taking part. During the 1994 CONMEBOL Cup, São Paulo FC ended up playing two games on one day, one in the cup and one in the league. It was a season in which they were runners up in the Copa Libertadores, made it to the semi-finals of the Super Copa, and then won the CONMEBOL Cup!

The early 1990s has seen the rise to prominence again of Brazil and Argentina. São Paulo FC won two Copa Libertadores in a row and capped these performances by going on to win the World Club Championship twice as well, whilst in 1994 Velez Sarsfield became the first side from Argentina to win the Copa Libertadores since River Plate in 1986.

To the end of the 1994 tournoments

ARGENTINA

Only the British have been playing the game longer, and few have ever played it better, than the Argentines. A championship was played there in 1891, a full five years before the first in mainland Europe, whilst their record of two World Cup victories is bettered only by Brazil, Germany and Italy. Had the Italians not continually swiped their best players - to play not only for their clubs but also for the national side until the rules were changed to forbid it - this figure would almost certainly be higher. After their initial entry in 1930 it was not until 1958 that Argentina made a serious bid to take part in the World Cup, and that collapsed around them as one of the best sides they had managed to put together was broken up by the unscrupulous Italian agents.

Argentina has produced more players of natural talent than almost any other country, as well as two of the greatest players ever in Alfredo di Stéfano and Diego Maradona. Both symbolise the excitement and the trauma Argentine football followers have had to endure. Di Stéfano left during the players' strike of 1948, never returned and ended up playing for Spain. Maradona left Argentina at the age of 21 having played four seasons with Argentinos Juniors and one with Boca, but that was all the Argentine public saw of him until he returned, past his prime, under the cloud of a drugs scandal. Both on their day were supreme footballers. Di Stéfano guided Real Madrid to countless honours in the 1950s, whilst Maradona not only guided Argentina to a World Cup victory in 1986 but also single-handedly transformed Napoli into one of the strongest teams in Europe.

The tragedy for Argentina is that these two were not the only ones to leave, and as a result the league, which by rights should be among the very best, often resembles the leftovers that the European clubs have rejected. Unfortunately, persistent economic pressures help reinforce this trend as players seek the higher wages on offer to them in Europe.

Football was brought to Argentina by the British, with whom the Argentines had very close links, and in May 1865 a team called Buenos Aires Football Club was founded. For many years the game was played exclusively by British residents in the capital, but by the end of the century it had been taken up by the locals. In 1887 Quilmes FC was formed by British railway workers, and they, along with Gimansia y Esgrima, formed five months previously in La Plata, 30 miles to the south of Buenos Aires, remain the two oldest clubs in the country. Not until after the turn of the century, however, did Gimnasia form a football section, a policy that had led disgruntled members to form Estudiantes de La Plata in 1905.

Many of the names of the clubs reflect the British involvement in the game. In 1889 Rosario Central were formed, whilst their great rivals from the same city are called Newell's Old Boys. In 1901 came the formation of River Plate, in 1903 Racing Club, in 1905 Boca Juniors and Independiente, and in 1908 Huracán; all had their origins in one or other of the migrant communities for which Argentina was famous. Boca Juniors, though founded by an Irishman, had their roots in the Italian community, Racing were named after the Paris-based club of the same name and wore the same light blue colours, whilst River Plate were formed by Englishmen. Of the current 'big five', only Independiente were formed by Argentines, all of whom worked for a store called City of London. The store already had a side but the Argentines wanted to play for a separate team, hence the name.

In 1891 Alexander Hutton, the director of the English High School, formed the Argentine Association Football League, and two years later this league was reformed as the Argentine Football Association. The winners of the first league in 1891, St Andrews, have since faded into the mists of time, as have Lomas Athletic and Alumni, the major powers until after the turn of the century. Alumni, made up of old boys from the English High School, were instrumental in popularising the game, but by the time of Racing's first championship in 1913, only a few British players remained and most teams were comprised of Argentinians. The Argentine championship was not a truly national competition. Only clubs from Buenos Aires, La Plata, Rosario and Santa Fe were ever invited to take part. The rest of the country had to make do with their own leagues, the first of which, the Liga Santiaguena de Futbol, was formed in 1906. Buenos Aires is, however, a large city, made up of 22 municipalities within which there are 50 barrios, or neighbourhoods. The identification of teams with either a municipality or barrio has ensured the survival of so many clubs in such a concentrated area, and the development of fierce rivalry between teams.

Not only was there a vibrant domestic scene in Argentine football, but along with Uruguay, Argentina were also at the forefront of the international game in South America. In 1901 a representative side took on a Uruguayan XI and a long rivalry was started that has seen more games than any other 'derby' encounter throughout the world. The match on 16 May was the first international played anywhere outside Great Britain. In 1905 these games were given a competitive edge when a cup was donated by Sir Thomas Lipton, the English tea baron. In these early years of international competition, the two countries played each other many times every year, and there is still confusion about which games should count as official internationals. Often two different 'national' teams took to the field on the same day. In 1910, Argentina organised a tournament between themselves, Uruguay and Chile, and although not strictly a South American Championship it was regarded as such at the time. Not until six years later, in celebration of Argentina's centenary, did the first recognised championship take place, and there began another rivalry with the Uruguayans to add to that of the Lipton and Newton Cups. Brazil very rarely threatened the Argentine-Uruguayan hegemony, except when the tournament was played on their home territory.

The game remained an amateur sport until the adoption of professionalism in 1931, but the years leading up to this event were often fraught with trouble as various different governing bodies were set up at the merest hint of an argument. In this pre-professional era, the most successful clubs were Racing Club and Huracán, the former a bastion of the amateur ideals. Neither adapted well to the new situation after 1931, and this was a factor that helped forge the success of both River Plate and Boca Juniors, the two most famous Argentine clubs. After 1931 the new professional league was the lifeblood of Argentine football until the 1960s when the Copa Libertadores caught the imagination. During this period the programme of the international side was very light, especially during the 1930s and 1950s when hardly any matches were played at all, further increasing the importance of the league.

The Boca Juniors side of the early 1930s and the River Plate side of the 1940s are counted among the greatest teams ever to have played in Argentina. Boca's side contained players such as Juan Evaristo, Cherro, Francisco Varallo, and the Brazilian Domingos da Guia, but perhaps the River Plate side was even better. At one time or another during their great decade, famous players like Bernabe Ferreyra, Carlos Peucelle, Angel Labruna, Jose Moreno and Adolfo Pedernera made River Plate the most famous club on the South American continent. The forward line containing Muñoz, Moreno, Pedernera and Loustau was referred to as la máquina - the machine - whilst the forward line of the 1947 championship winning side consisting of Reyes, Moreno, Di Stéfano, Labruna and Loustau was regarded as one of the best ever.

Up until the late 1950s Argentina remained an isolationist within the world game. Uruguay, Brazil and Paraguay were their only regular opponents outside the South American Championship which, along with Uruguay, they dominated from the start. Had they entered more than just the 1928 Olympic Games and the 1930 World Cup, Argentina might well have been world champions many years before they finally were in 1978. The national side's first excursion to Europe was for the 1928 Amsterdam Olympic Games. Domingo Tarasconi was in tremendous form and scored an amazing 12 goals in three games leading up to the final. It was Argentina's misfortune to meet Uruguay there, two sides who knew each other inside out. Tarasconi could not reproduce his form in the final and the Argentines lost after a replay. Two years later, Uruguay completed a double over them by winning the first World Cup final. This time Stabile was scoring the goals for Argentina, but despite taking a 2-1 half-time lead in Montevideo they succumbed to three second-half goals and went home runners-up yet again. A team did travel to the 1934 World Cup in Italy, but for fear of losing more players like Monti and Orsi to the Italian game, a third-rate side was sent that did not survive the first round. Not until the late 1950s did the national side resurface with any great enthusiasm.

The 1957 South American Championship saw the birth of a very good side containing another of Argentina's famous forward lines. Corbatta, Maschio, Angelillo, Sivori and Cruz caused a sensation in Lima, so much so that as soon as the tournament finished, Bologna signed Maschio, Juventus signed Sivori and Internazionale signed Angelillo. All three never played for Argentina again, appearing instead briefly for Italy. With a severely depleted side, the Argentines made the journey to Sweden for the 1958 World Cup and were promptly eliminated in the first round. Argentine football has now come to terms with the constant flow of players moving abroad and has used the extra experience gained by these players to its advantage. The rule introduced by FIFA forbidding the practice of playing for more than one country was crucial in this respect.

Argentina is lucky, though, in that there seems to be a huge reservoir of very talented players in the country, and often the national side has not needed to rely on the foreign-based players. This was especially true in 1978 when at last Argentina won the World Cup. Of the winning side, only Mario Kempes played his football abroad. Argentina had been awarded the tournament after many failed attempts, but the deteriorating political situation nearly saw them lose it to the Low Countries. In the event, the 1978 tournament was notable for the superb atmosphere in which it was played, especially when Argentina took to the field and the stadium disappeared under a sea of sky blue and white tickertape. After winning their first two games, Argentina then lost to Italy which meant they had to overcome Brazil in their second round group. They made it through to the final only in somewhat controversial fashion.

When Brazil's victory over Poland left the Argentines needing to beat Peru 4-0, they scored six. The Brazilians cried foul, but this was an Argentine side desperate to please the home crowd and wipe out all the disappointments of the past. The front line of Kempes and Luque was in sparkling form, as were Ardiles and Bertoni in midfield. In defence they could rely on the towering presence of captain Daniel Passarella, later to become the national team coach. It was Passarella who lifted the trophy after the 3-1 victory against Holland in the final, but it was the performance of Kempes, who scored two excellent goals, which made it possible. There was much sympathy for Holland, losers in two consecutive finals, but Argentina were worthy winners, and it was just reward for all the fine footballers that they had produced in the past who had never had the opportunity to shine on the world stage.

Since 1978, along with Germany, Argentina have been the most potent force in international football. They have reached three of the last five World Cup finals, and in 1986 won the title for the second time. Central to the side was Diego Maradona, who along with Di Stéfano, Pelé and Cruyff ranks among the very best footballers the world has ever produced. Many rate him as the best ever. Home advantage may have been crucial to their victory in 1978, but in 1986, in what was a very open field, the Argentines were superb. Of the seven games played they won six, only the Italians holding them to a draw, and along the way they beat Uruguay, England, Belgium and West Germany. The final in the Azteca against the Germans was a classic encounter in which the winning goal from Jorge Burruchaga came just minutes from the end.

The side that won in Mexico contained some excellent players like Burruchaga, Valdano, Ruggeri and Pumpido, but Maradona was the undoubted star and it was to him that they looked for inspiration in their time of need. His second goal against England in the quarter-final is one of the best ever witnessed in the World Cup, though his first, the notorious 'Hand of God', will be remembered for different reasons. With Maradona Argentina appeared unstoppable, and although West Germany caused them a few heart-stopping moments towards the end of the final, it was no surprise that they finally won.

Four years later saw a repeat of 1986 when the Germans again faced Maradona and his Argentine side in the final, though this time Argentina lost in what is generally regarded as the worst final in the history of the tournament. Despite their reaching the final, Italia '90 was not a happy experience for Argentina. Their tactics were roundly condemned and they used penalty-kicks to excellent effect to reach a final that their form did not merit. They were up against the odds, however. Pumpido was carried off in the second game of the tournament with a broken leg, whilst Maradona was at half-speed due to injury.

Club football has remained remarkably buoyant despite the exodus of players, and in the Copa Libertadores Argentine clubs have a record second to none. Although they were slow to take to the competition, between 1964 and 1978 only three clubs from elsewhere could prise the trophy from Argentine hands. Two clubs have been especially pre-eminent, and surprisingly they were not Boca and River Plate but Independiente and Estudiantes de La Plata, neither of whom were particularly strong in the league at the time of their successes.

Unfortunately, Estudiantes were responsible for showing the world the dark side of Argentine football epitomised by their poor sportsmanship in the 1966 World Cup. It got to the stage where police were arresting players after the match for poor behaviour during it, notably after the World Club Championship match between Estudiantes and Milan in 1969 when three players from Estudiantes were imprisoned. Independiente won the Copa Libertadores four times in a row in the 1970s with a side including Ricardo Bochini, Daniel Bertoni and Ruben Galvan, the last two going on to star in Argentina's 1978 World Cup victory, and they remain the top club in the history of the competition with their record seven wins.

There was a major reorganisation of the league in 1967. Up until then the championship, though including all the major clubs, was not open to every team. It was renamed the Metropolitan League and a national championship, open to all of the clubs around the country, was started to run alongside it. Since the start of the 1970s, the stranglehold of the big Buenos Aires clubs has gradually been broken down as the two Rosario clubs and some of the less well-known clubs from the capital have begun to make their presence felt. Further reorganisation in 1985 saw, for the first time, a single national first division, as the national championship in its previous form was scrapped. There now exists a second division beneath which there are 32 regional leagues and three further leagues for clubs from Buenos Aires.

The Argentine league is unique in world football in that each year it produces two champions. For the 1992 season the league was broken up into two halves, the Apertura and the Clausura. Initially there was a play-off between the two winners, but after one season this was stopped. It is an experiment that has had mixed results; certainly crowd interest is sustained, but there is the feeling that no sooner has one season started than it finishes, demeaning the success of the sides who win it.

Argentina will always be at the centre of world football. In 1994 Velez Sarsfield, a relatively unsuccessful side in the Argentine league, beat AC Milan to become world club champions, but there was controversy for the national side at the World Cup finals in the USA. Having suffered four dreadful years in which he had flitted from club to club and served a fifteen-month ban for cocaine abuse, Maradona returned to the international stage looking like a new man. In their opening game against Greece, he and Argentina looked in stunning form and seemed to be on course for a third World Cup. Then, however, Maradona failed a drugs test and was banned once more. It was a sad end to an outstanding career.

Perhaps Argentina do not need him. In 1991 they were crowned South American champions for the first time since the 1950s, they retained the title in 1993 and were quarter-finalists in 1995. There is a still a constant flow of talented players emerging, such as Gabriel Batistuta who has equalled, and looks set to beat, Maradona's record of goals for the national team.

BOLIVIA

Bolivia are on the lowest rung of the South American ladder, but have the pleasure of knowing that they have at least taken part in three World Cup final tournaments and in 1963 were crowned South American champions, a feat that not even Chile or Colombia can boast of.

A Chilean, Leoncio Zuaznabar, founded the first club in Bolivia, Oruro Royal Club in 1896, but the game spread slowly throughout the rest of the country. The major cities are mostly located in the mountains of the Andes, so perhaps the slow growth is not surprising. The Federación Boliviana de Fútbol was formed in Cochabamba in 1925 and the following year it launched a national championship for representative sides, but the real power lay high up in the mountains in the capital La Paz.

In 1908 The Strongest were formed, and they remain the oldest senior club. Six years later the La Paz league was founded and it came to be regarded as the national league. Until clubs from outside La Paz were invited to take part in the league in the early 1950s, it was dominated by The Strongest and Bolivar. Since that time, however, clubs from Cochabamba and Santa Cruz have begun to make their mark, especially Jorge Wilsterman and Oriente Petrolero.

A major reorganisation took place in 1977 with the formation of a truly national league for the first time to replace the Campeonato Professional de Fútbol, as the La Paz league had become known. The standard has remained fairly low overall as the record in the Copa Libertadores shows: three semi-final appearances is equal to that of Venezuela, and together they stand at the bottom of overall standings in the competition.

The national side made its debut in the 1926 South American Championships but it was not an auspicious introduction to international football. Two goals were scored and 24 conceded in the four matches played. The experience the following year was not dissimilar, and the 19 goals against in three matches effectively put an end to their participation until 1945. The lure of the 1930 World Cup in Uruguay was too hard to resist, though, and surprisingly the games against Brazil and Yugoslavia were not the heavy defeats many expected them to be. Bolivia lost

4-0 on both occasions, results that were better than all bar one of their scores in the previous South American Championship excursions.

Entry into the Bolivarian Games in 1938, in which they finished an encouraging second to Peru, was followed by four successive appearances in the South American Championships in the 1940s. As expected the results were not good to start with but in the 1949 tournamment in Brazil, the Bolivians finished an astonishing fourth out of the eight entries. Victories over Chile, Uruguay, Ecuador and Colombia gave Bolivia real hope for the World Cup the following year in the same country. But any thoughts of a repeat victory over Uruguay, their only first round opponents, were quickly dashed by an 8-0 thrashing. Undeterred, Bolivia entered the 1953 South American Championships in Lima and spoilt the party by beating the hosts in the opening game, but it was downhill from then on and they finished next from bottom. Since then the national side has regularly taken part in the tournaments open to them.

To the end of the 1994 season

The World Cup, in particular, has always been a favoured hunting ground. Bolivia's overall record is good because of one overwhelming advantage, the altitude of La Paz. Situated at over 12,000 feet above sea level, La Paz is the highest capital city in the world. The advantage to the Bolivian players, who are used to the thin air, is enormous, and they have used this to great effect in the World Cup. Argentina and Chile were beaten in 1957 and since then, had it not been for a poor away record, the world would have seen a lot more of the Bolivians than they have done. In 1993 they created history by beating Brazil in La Paz, the first time the Brazilians had ever lost a World Cup qualifier, and went on to win all of the qualifying matches in La Paz to reach the finals for only the third time. Outside of their fortress they were eventually brought down to earth, but not before gaining their first point and scoring their first goal in the finals.

The 1963 South American Championship, held in La Paz and Cochabamba, was another occasion on which Bolivia used the conditions to their advantage, as they won their only title to date. Although not as high as La Paz, at 8,000 feet altitude is still a significant factor in Cochabamba. Víctor Ugarte, captain of the side and the most famous Bolivian footballer of all time, utilised this as he led his team on an extraordinary run of results culminating in a 5-4 win over the Brazilians in Cochabamba.

Whenever a tournament involves the Bolivians playing at home, they are always in with a shout. They finished above Argentina in the 1970 World Cup qualifiers, won their group in 1978, finishing above Uruguay only to lose to Hungary in a play-off, and in 1979 beat both Brazil and Argentina at home in the South American Championship only to lose to both of them away and finish a point behind Brazil at the end. It is noticeable that their performances in this tournament improved when it was held on a home and away basis from 1975 until 1983 and have slumped again since it reverted back to single country location. If Bolivia are to win another tournament it is essential they persuade CONMEBOL that La Paz is just the place to spend two weeks in the South American winter!

BRAZIL

After it dazzled the world for a generation, many felt that Brazilian football would be unable to recapture its past glories. In the 1950s and 1960s they were blessed with so many players of outstanding talent that in six World Cups Brazil reached the final on four occasions and won three of them, but after their 1970 triumph came failure after failure, even when they were the outstanding team, such as in 1982. The USA '94 tournament saw all that change, however, as the World Cup was won for a record fourth time.

Brazil has always been regarded as the spiritual home of football, primarily as a result of the teams produced in the fifties and sixties. They were so popular and successful because they combined supreme footballing skills with a carefree arrogance that left their opponents in awe of them, especially when those opponents came from outside of South America. To Europeans, players such as Pele and Garrincha attained an almost mystical quality because they never plied their trade in Europe as so many Argentines and Uruguayans did. Instead the only glimpses they caught of these players were at World Cups or when the Brazilian national team or teams like Santos came to Europe on tours.

Away from Europe, and beyond the gaze of those who admired them so much, the story of Brazilian football is a different matter altogether. Success has been limited for both the national side in the South American Championships and the club sides in the Copa Libertadores, so much so that the River Plate estuary, encompassing both Buenos Aires and Montevideo, is seen as the real home of football on the continent.

The structure of Brazilian football is certainly the reason why it has suffered in comparison to Uruguay and Argentina. The huge size of the country - it is the fifth biggest in the world and takes up more than half of the South American continent - has meant that only in recent years has there been any semblance of a national competition for club sides. Politically the country is divided into 27 states, many of which are larger in size and have bigger populations than an average size European country. Each state therefore has its own governing body for football and organises its own state league. The idea of a national league was just not feasible. Such a system, however, has left a legacy of chaos and infighting between the different organisations as they all vie for a say in how the game should be run.

Football is said to have been introduced into Brazil by Charles Miller, a worker with the Sao Paulo Railway Company at the end of the 19th century. As is the case with other South American countries, British residents in Brazil had formed sports clubs in which they spent much of their spare time playing cricket. Miller succeeded in persuading the Sao Paulo Athletic Club to start a football section, and soon other clubs followed suit.

Sao Paulo and Rio de Janeiro were the first cities to start playing football on a large scale and in 1901, the Campeonato Paulista de Futebol was founded in Sao Paulo, based on a strong British contingent. The first tournament was completed in 1902 and won by Charles Miller's Sao Paulo Athletic Club. Miller himself finished top scorer with 10 goals. It was not long before Rio got in on the act and formed the Liga Metropolitana de Football do Rio de Janeiro in 1905. Again the British presence was strong. Fluminense, another club founded by an Englishman, Oscar Cox, won the first tournament.

Brazilians of European descent other than the British very quickly took up the game. By 1914 all of the major clubs had been formed in Rio and Sao Paulo, and all in one way or another had links to one of the white European communities. Vasco da Gama were a Portuguese-based sailing club formed in 1898. Corinthians, though they were named after the famous English amateur side who made a tour of the country in 1910, were founded by five Brazilians of Portuguese descent. The Italians were not left out. Palestra Italia, later to become SE Palmeiras, was formed by Italian workers in the aftermath of an exhibition match played by Pro Vercelli and Torino in 1914, whilst Germania, as the name suggests, were the team of the German community.

Football also spread to other cities, most notably Belo Horizonte, Porto Alegre, Salvador, Recife, Curitiba and Fortaleza and by 1920 there were 15 state leagues in operation. Although under the jurisdiction of the Federacao Brasileira de Sports - later to become the Confederacao Brasileira de Desportes (CBD) - these leagues were run by state governing bodies who over the years built up a strong power base, which eventually led to much controversy in the 1970s as they began to flex their muscles.

Until the 1970s, however, the leagues in Rio de Janeiro and Sao Paulo were the most important competitions in the country. Although Rio select teams played Sao Paulo state selections every year in the Taca Correio da Manha from 1913 to 1923, and from 1923 to 1963 in the Campeonato Brasileiro de Selecoes, in which other state selections could enter, there was no national championship for clubs until 1950. Even then the Rio-Sao Paulo Championship, as the tournament was called, was not open to teams outside of the big two. Given that the Campeonato de Selecoes was won by either Rio or Sao Paulo every year bar 1934 when Bahia were the winners, this is perhaps not surprising.

Both the Rio and Sao Paulo leagues remained amateur and largely closed to the coloured population until the 1920s when a series of events changed the face of Brazilian football. Vasco da Gama emerged from the shadows of the more famous Rio clubs in 1923 when, playing a team containing coloured players, they ran away with the Rio title. Other clubs, realising the benefits of this untapped source of footballers, soon followed suit with the result that in terms of football at least, Brazil became the first racially-integrated country.

Administrative struggles also marked the early years of football in Rio but more especially in Sao Paulo where it was not uncommon to have two different leagues in operation. Professionalism was the cause that in the end united football in each of the cities, despite initially causing further splits. By the early 1940s, Brazil had emerged as a strong, racially-integrated, professional footballing nation capable of taking on the strongest of opponents. As the results of the national team show, before this time this had not been the case.

Brazil was rather slow in taking up international football. The difficulties in selecting a team from all of the different leagues were compounded by the huge distances involved in travelling to games. Therefore it was not until 1913 that any Brazilian representative side left the country to play a game. Surprisingly, Brazil's first registered representative match was played by a Bahia selection against a North American selection in August 1903 in Salvador. In 1906 a Sao Paulo selection lost heavily to the touring South African side, and in 1908 a touring Argentine combination played three matches against a Sao Paulo selection and one each against a Rio, Santos and a combined Brazilian selection. An Argentine combination toured again in 1912 whilst a Portuguese combination made the trip across the Atlantic in 1913.

With the formation of the Federacao Brasileira de Sports, a truly national team was picked for the first time on 21 July 1914 for a match against Exeter City, but the first full international was not played until two months later with a friendly match against Argentina in Buenos Aires, followed a week later by the first edition of the Roca Cup, an irregular competition played between the two countries. Brazil entered a team for the first South American Championship in 1916, but as in future editions, it did not prove to be a happy hunting ground. Over the next forty years the majority of the games played were in this competition and out of over twenty tournaments played, only three were won and in each case on Brazilian soil.

Despite the relative lack of success in the early years, Brazil produced many fine players, the most famous of whom were Artur Friedenreich, Leonidas da Silva, Domingos da Guia, Romeu, Tim and Fausto. Players like Leonidas would have won more caps for their country but for the chaos on the home front and disputes with neighbouring countries restricting the number of games played during the whole of the 1930s to just 22. Friedenreich, however, still found plenty of opportunities to score goals in domestic competitions and the 1329 goals he scored between 1909 and 1934 is a world record that will surely never be equalled.

Brazil entered the first World Cup in Montevideo, and in a result symptomatic of their fortunes at the time were knocked out by Yugoslavia in the first round. Since then the winning of the World Cup has become an obsession for everybody involved in Brazilian football. They have entered and qualified for every tournament held, the only country to do so. The 1934 tournament was no less disastrous than the first, as they lost to Spain in the first round. In 1938 Brazil showed their true potential for the first time, reaching the semi-finals, but overconfidence, not for the last time, lost them the semi-final against Italy. Inexplicably, Leonidas was rested for what the selectors assumed would be the final, but instead turned out to be the third place play-off!

The golden age of Brazilian football came between 1950 and 1970 and it is for this period that the Brazilians are best remembered. In 1949, in preparation for the 1950

World Cup which they had been given the responsibility of hosting, Brazil staged the South American Championship and won it despite being taken to a play-off by Paraguay. No less than 46 goals were scored in just 8 games as Ademir and Jair Pinto, to name just two, ran riot in their opponents' penalty area.

This form was repeated the following year in the World Cup, and perhaps there have never been more clear-cut favourites than Brazil that year. Twenty-one goals en route to the final game had many Brazilians celebrating before the game against Uruguay had begun. Brazil needed just a draw from the game to top the second round group and win the World Cup. When Friaca scored early in the second half they looked to be there, but in one of the greatest upsets in the history of the tournament, Uruguay scored twice to snatch the title from the hosts. Perhaps the result should not be considered that surprising. Consistently the masters of Brazil in the South American Championship, Uruguay knew the Brazilian style inside out and exploited that knowledge, even though they could not match them for skill or flair.

By 1954 the basis of a much more stable side was growing. In defence both Nilton and Djalma Santos were proving very effective whilst the midfield was being run effectively by Didi, but once again the World Cup was to prove elusive. In the famous quarter-final with Hungary, Brazil lost to the best team in the tournament, but not before violence flared on and off the field in a game that has become known as the 'Battle of Berne'.

Four years later the inevitable happened when Brazil finally won the tournament they had set their hearts on. The forward line of Garrincha, Vavá, Pelé and Zagalo was the clinching factor. Pelé was especially vital. His presence at only 17 caused a huge stir and he became an instant hero and a household name around the world after his performance against Sweden in the final. Most would class Pelé as the greatest footballer ever, above even Maradona, Di Stéfano or Cruyff, and for over a decade he came to epitomise Brazilian football. He appeared for Brazil in the 1958, 1962, 1966 and 1970 World Cup finals, though injury meant he did not appear in the final itself against Czechoslovakia in 1962. Instead it was Garrincha who was the driving force in a team that was almost identical to that of 1958.

The 1966 side that lost its crown in England was in a transitional stage and again Pelé did not have a happy time as he was continually fouled. He even threatened to give up football in the face of such treatment. Gone from the side were Didi, Nilton Santos, Vavá, Zito, Zózimo and Zagalo, whilst in had come Tostao, Gérson and Jairzinho. Portugal and Hungary qualified from the group and Brazil went home after the first round for only the third time in their history.

The 1970 side that won the World Cup in Mexico has been described as the best football team ever to take the field in a World Cup. At the back, Carlos Alberto marshalled a defence that liked to attack and so consequently relied on scoring more goals than they let in, but the mix worked. In attack, Pelé was back to his most masterful self and he, Jairzinho, Rivelino and Tostao were a potent force to match that of the 1958 forward line. No-one except England came close to matching the Brazilians in Mexico and their performance in the final against Italy was one of the best displays the World Cup has ever seen. A good Italian side were simply not in the same class, especially in the second half when the Brazilians seemed to toy with them as a cat would with a mouse. Their fourth goal, scored by the captain Carlos Alberto, typified the versatility of their game. The move involved nine passes both long and short, a mazy dribble and a lightning finish that had the Italian defence looking on in admiration.

From 1970 until 1994 the national side never reached the same heights and had to live in the shadow of the performances of the 1950-70 era. Only once, in 1982, did they come close, when the likes of Sócrates, Falcao, Junior and Zico played a brand of football reminiscent of 1970. Instead, the side tended to ape the rigid tactical approach of the Europeans and this did not stand them in good stead. This was especially true in the 1990 World Cup, and in a dreadful game against Argentina, the team lost in the second round to howls of derision back in Brazil.

The club scene in Brazil has also suffered since 1970. The big clubs from Rio and Sao Paulo had introduced an annual tournament in 1950 between the best teams from the two cities, the winners of which were regarded as national champions. Pressure from the other state leagues to be involved led to the Roberto Gomez Pedrosa tournament in 1967. Minas Gerais, Rio Grande do Sul and Parana were involved for the first time that year whilst the following year Bahia and Pernambuco were invited to send sides. The ball had started to roll and soon all the states in the country were anxious to take part, and as the Confederacao Brasileira de Futebol is in effect controlled by the various state governing bodies. Pressure from them led to the formation of a national championship in 1971. Throughout the 1970s the number of participants rose as even the smallest states demanded to take part, and by 1979 the national league consisted of 94 teams.

It has been the practice for the Brazilian season to be divided in half. The national championship now occupies the second half of the year, and the state leagues the first half. Football is thus played all year round with hardly a break. Increasingly the big clubs from Rio and Sao Paulo have become unhappy with the status quo, not just because of the number of games they play but also the long distances they have to travel to play the small teams in the national league. Threats of breakaways and the like have never materialised and club football continues on in its confused way. The mechanisms used for deciding the champions in either the national or the state leagues vary from year to year and from state to state, and have often been decided on after the tournament has started. The Brazilians are not keen on a European-style league and tend to have various stages to sustain interest, ultimately leading to a grand final.

To the end of the 1994 season and the 1995 Cup

Amid so much confusion it is perhaps not surprising that the Copa Libertadores has not been a favoured hunting ground for Brazilian clubs. The first difficulty in the 1960s was who should qualify, so a Brazilian Cup was introduced to find an entrant. From 1971 the national champions and runners-up qualified but in 1989 the Cup was re-introduced to qualify one team to join the national champions. Only two teams from either Rio or Sao Paulo have ever won the Copa Libertadores and only five Brazilian teams have won it at all. Pelé's Santos won it twice in the early 1960s, but since then only Flamengo, Sao Paulo FC, Gremio from Porto Alegre and Cruzeiro from Belo Horizonte have won it. This is all the more extraordinary considering the fact that until the 1980s, unlike the rest of South America, Brazilians did not tend to move abroad to play their football. Pelé, Tostao, Rivelino, Didi, Garrincha and Zico, for example, played almost all of their football at home. Didi spent one unsuccessful season at Real Madrid, whilst Zico returned home from Italy after two.

There is no doubt that Brazilian club football is in need of an urgent overhaul. If they do have anything to learn from Europe it is the benefit of a stable club structure. The case for abandoning the state leagues and implementing a streamlined national league is strong. The game in Brazil needs a focus and at present does not have one. Until it does and the clubs can woo back supporters that have almost disappeared except for the very big games, club football in Brazil will continue to struggle on.

Amidst all of this, however, in 1994 the national team finally won the World Cup again, after 24 years of waiting. Under Carlos Alberto Parreira, part of the coaching staff at the 1970 World Cup, Brazil played a disciplined game. Even with star players like Bebeto and Romario, the team was regarded as functional rather than brilliant, but it worked. The captain, Dunga, epitomised the new mood of relying on hard work and team spirit to see them through. Whether the World Cup win will have a positive impact on clubs in Brazil is less certain, but the possibilities are there. São Paulo FC have emerged to challenge the Argentine clubs while Cruzeiro, Atletico Mineiro and Botafogo have all won continental titles in the 1990s. There is no reason why the clubs should not take after the national team and succeed at the highest level.

CHILE

After the 'big three', Chile is often regarded as the fourth strongest nation on the South American continent. It is somewhat surprising, therefore, that its first ever honour came in 1991 when Colo Colo won the Copa Libertadores. Until then Chile's history had been a tale of nearly but not quite.

The British in the port of Valparaiso and the neighbouring resort of Viña del Mar first introduced football to Chile, and the first club, Valparaiso FC, was formed in 1889. In 1895 nine clubs of mainly British origin formed the Football Association of Chile, the second oldest on the continent after Argentina.

Chile is a thin, elongated country and although roughly in the centre, the capital Santiago is a good distance from many of the major towns in the rest of Chile, so as football spread around the country regional associations were set up to administer the game. From 1910 until 1933 the Copa Arturo Allesandri was the main competition in the country. Played for by representative sides of the regional associations, all of which ran their own league, it was supplanted by the new professional national league in 1933.

Prime motivators for the new league were Colo Colo, formed in 1925 by dissident members of Magallanes. The Liga Metropolitana in Santiago formed the basis of the new national league, and from the start Colo Colo have been the dominant force. The area around Santiago has always been the most powerful, and only four teams from outside this region have ever won the championship.

Along with Colo Colo the most prominent sides have been the two university clubs, Universidad de Chile and Universidad Catolica, as well as Union Española.

Recently, however, provincial clubs have begun to challenge the supremacy of Santiago, none more so than Cobreloa from the small mining town of Calama in the north. Five times winners of the championship, they twice reached the final of the Copa Libertadores in the early 1980s.

The national side first took the field when they travelled to Buenos Aires for the unofficial South American Championship in 1910, although their first game was a friendly match against Argentina two days before the tournament got under way. Not until 1926, however, 23 matches later, did Chile win a game, despite the 1922 tournament being held in Viña del Mar. In 1926 Santiago staged the competition and, spurred on by David Arellano who had founded Colo Colo the previous year, Chile beat both Bolivia and Paraguay to finish third out of the five entrants, the first occasion on which they had not finished bottom. Also in good form was Guillermo Subiabre who finished the tournament as joint top scorer.

Chile made the trip to the Amsterdam Olympics in 1928 and luckily for them a consolation tournament for the first round losers had been arranged, so after losing to Portugal they did not have to go home after just one match. They fared much better in this tournament, beating Mexico and then drawing 2-2 with the hosts Holland. Entry into the 1930 World Cup nearly proved fruitful, but a 3-1 loss to Argentina in the final group match of the first round meant they were eliminated despite having beaten both France and Mexico. Once again their top player was Subiabre, but unfortunately for him there was a five-year gap before the next match.

The 1937 South American Championship in Buenos Aires produced another Chilean hero in Raul Toro, and he finished as the top scorer with 7 goals in 4 games. It did not do his side much good, however, as their poor showings in the tournament continued. They were generally weak in the tournaments played away from Chile but played well when they hosted the series, such as in 1945 and 1955.

Regular though not particularly successful competitors in the World Cup from 1950 onwards, Chile have taken part in five final tournaments out of the 11 held since that date. Only once have they progressed beyond the first round, and that was as hosts in 1962. Based in Santiago in the first round, Chile beat both Switzerland and Italy in their first two matches, though the latter has become known as the 'Battle of Santiago' as tempers flared between the two sides. Relations between Italy and the hosts were not good. A series of articles written by Italian journalists criticising Chile had not gone down well in Santiago and the hostility spilled over onto the pitch. Italy's Argentinian, Maschio, had his nose broken, two Italians were sent off and all hell broke loose in a match that was nearly abandoned.

The victory over Italy qualified Chile for a quarter-final tie against the Soviet Union in far away Arica. Leonel Sanchez, the top Chilean footballer of the time, gave his side the lead after 11 minutes, and a minute after Chislenko equalised Eladio Rojas scored the winner in what was without question the best result in the history of the country. The hosts were no match for the Brazilians in the semi-finals and bowed out of the tournament, although they had some consolation in winning the third place play-off against Yugoslavia. The 1962 World Cup was Chile's finest hour. Home advantage had played a large part in their third place and it is unlikely that the national side will ever reach the same heights again.

To the end of the 1994 season & 1993 cup

Further controversy erupted in the 1974 World Cup qualifying tournament. By beating Peru, Chile qualified to play the Soviet Union in a play-off for a place in West Germany. After drawing 0-0 in Moscow, the Soviet Union refused to play in the Estadio Nacional in Santiago. In 1973, Chile's left-wing government of President Allende had been overthrown by General Pinochet and the army, and when they rounded up all the left-wing and communist activists they were kept in the stadium. Few of them ever left. The Soviet Union did not feel able to play under such conditions, and after failing to turn up on the day they were disqualified. In one of the most bizarre sights ever seen at a football ground, the Chileans turned up for the game, kicked off and walked the ball into the Soviet goal.

Since then Chile have continued on their unremarkable way. In 1979 they reached the final of the South American Championships, but the route was not exactly perilous. Colombia and Venezuela were overcome in the first round and Peru in the semi-finals before they lost to Paraguay over three games in the final. They reached the final again in 1987, losing this time to Uruguay.

Two years later, Chile were involved in one of the most unsavoury incidents of recent years when during a crucial World Cup qualifier against Brazil, they tried to cheat their way into the finals when 1-0 down. A flare hit their goalkeeper Rojas, he was taken off injured, and the rest of the team also left the field, hoping that Brazil would be banned. It transpired, however, that the whole incident was planned and that Rojas' injuries were self-inflicted. It was Chile who were banned and prevented from taking part in USA '94; it was the third tournament in a row they had missed, their worst ever run.

In the aftermath of this episode, however, came Chile's finest moment with Colo Colo's victory in the 1991 Copa Libertadores. On the way to the final they beat both Nacional of Uruguay and Boca Juniors, and in the final they overcame defending champions Olimpia, winning the second leg 3-0 before a full house in the Estadio Nacional. The celebrations which followed are unlikely to be repeated in the near future, however, as since then Chile's 'nearly men' image has been reinforced. Universidad Catolica reached the final in 1993 but lost to São Paulo, whilst in the South American Championship the national side could no better then third in 1991, despite home advantage, and have subsequently found themselves upstaged by the emerging Colombians.

COLOMBIA

To find a country with a more turbulent football history than Colombia would be a difficult task. From shooting referees to paying players with money laundered from the drugs business, Colombia has it all. And who can forget the murder of Andres Escobar after his side's disappointing performance in USA '94? The Colombians have also enraged other nations by their flagrant disregard of the rules set down by FIFA, but despite all of this, after years of achieving little, Colombia is emerging as the biggest threat to the established powers of Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay.

As was common in South America, a port, Barranquilla, was the first place football really took a hold. Until the introduction of professionalism in 1948, Barranquilla was the centre of football in the country. The first ruling body of any kind in the country, the Liga de Football del Atlantico was founded there in 1924. Affiliation to FIFA occurred seven years later, but the fact that both these events happened some forty years after the first recorded game was played gives an indication as to how disjointed progress was.

Colombia is a very large country. Roughly half of the total area comprises the northern boundary of the Amazon basin, whilst much of the rest of the country is taken up by the northern reaches of the Andes. A majority of the cities are located in these mountains, so it is not surprising that communications were not good.

The first game adhering to the proper rules is said to have taken place in Bogota, the capital, in 1887, but for many years football was played on an ad hoc basis with no proper organisation. A national body was finally formed in 1938 and known as the Asociacion Colombiana de Futbol, but clubs in all the different provinces were under the control of various regional associations, not the ACF.

An annual tournament for representative teams from the various regional leagues was introduced, but the main role of the ACF was to put together a national side and in 1938, Colombia joined the Confederacion Centro-americano y del Caribe de Futbol and later that year made their international debut in the Central American and Caribbean Games. Bogota then hosted the Bolivar games at the end of the year, but neither tournament proved successful for the Colombians and it was five years before they played another game.

In 1940 the ACF decided to join the South American confederation in apparent contradiction to its membership of the CCCF, but from that time Colombia has stuck with South America and eventually gave up membership of the Central American body.

The early 1940s saw major developments at club level and they were ultimately to lead to notoriety for Colombia at the end of the decade. Professionalism was becoming a major issue and in 1939 the club that was to represent the new era in Colombian football was founded by two wealthy businessmen in Bogota. Known initially as Deportivo Municipal, in 1947 they officially adopted their nickname, 'Los Millonarios', a reference to the size of their bank balance.

Wealthy patrons became involved with other clubs also. The amateur era passed into history with the creation of a new professional league in 1948, but instead of making this a platform from which to build, Colombia hit the self-destruct button. Players were imported from all over South America and the league was an instant hit. In 1950 the DiMayor, as the league was known, broke away form the ACF, and there followed four years of turmoil that put Colombia on the world football map.

Known as the 'El Dorado' period, it saw Colombia assemble some of the world's best talent, much to the dismay of the rest of the world. After the breakaway, Colombia had been suspended from FIFA which meant that transfer fees did not have to be paid. At the same time a players' strike in both Argentina and Uruguay meant many of the continent's best players were available for transfer. Signing-on fees and wages higher than anywhere else meant that soon there were up to 70 Argentinians, 15 Uruguayans and six Britons, among others, playing in the DiMayor.

Among those tempted to Colombia were Alfredo Di Stefano, Nestor Rossi and Adolfo Pedernera, all major stars with River Plate before they came to Colombia. Even England was raided and Neil Franklin, the England centre-half at the time, was signed up by Millonarios' major cross-town rivals, Santa Fe.

El Dorado was not to last long, however. In 1954 FIFA accepted Colombia back into the fold, whilst most of the major stars had by then departed, in many cases to Europe. The bubble had well and truly burst, leaving many clubs in severe financial trouble. There had been 18 clubs in the DiMayor at its peak; by 1955 the number had shrunk to just 10. The reliance on foreign players, and the high standard they set, had left a dearth of home-grown talent. Spectator interest waned and Colombia slipped firmly into the international football backwaters from which it had briefly risen.

The national team proved a fairer indication of the standard of Colombian footballers. They had entered three editions of the South American Championship in the 1940s, and out of 20 games played only won one. Many of the defeats were substantial, and from 1949 until 1957 no further international matches were played. There was a brief flurry of international activity in 1957 which included a victory over Uruguay in the South American Championships, as well as a first attempt to qualify for the World Cup, but with a group containing Uruguay and Paraguay, Colombia placed comfortably last behind the other vastly more experienced sides.

It was a great surprise, therefore, when the Colombians did qualify for the 1962 finals, but with both Chile and Brazil qualifying automatically, all that involved was two games with Peru. A 1-0 win in Bogota was sufficient to see them through. Very much the unknown quantity, their 2-1 and 5-0 defeats by Uruguay and Yugoslavia respectively were redeemed by a superb display against the Soviet Union, their finest performance to that date. Losing 4-1 at one point, they fought back to draw 4-4. The experience was not built upon and the team faded back into obscurity until the mid-1970s.

At home, the DiMayor had struggled on after El Dorado. Millonarios briefly rose again in the late 1950s and early 1960s but the team did not have the same aura about it as before. In 1965, the self-destruct button was pushed once again with the creation of the Federacion del Futbol Colombiana as a direct challenge to the authority of the ACF. FIFA was called in to mediate in the dispute and ended up directly running the game until 1971 when a wholly new Federacion Colombiana de Futbol was formed. Meanwhile, 1968 saw a complete reorganisation of the league competition in response to the post El Dorado depression that had enveloped the game. A simple, European-style league was replaced by what can seem an unbelievably complicated structure.

Three phases were introduced, the Apertura, the Finalizacion and finally the Serie Definitiva. The precise system has varied from year to year since, but broadly speaking the first two phases are used to select a final group of clubs to play in the last stage, from which the champions emerge. Bonus points are awarded throughout the season which is why it was possible for America to win the 1983 championship with 19.75 points. The changes have largely been popular and since 1968 the league has been relatively stable and has improved in standard.

Much of this has been due to the progress made by the city of Cali. From 1968 until 1990 the city won the title on 12 occasions either through Deportivo Cali or America Cali. Both were also the first Colombian clubs to make inroads in the Copa Libertadores. Deportivo were losing finalists in 1978, whilst America were losing finalists three years running in the mid-1980s. How much of this progress has been due to the Cali drug cartel helping to fund the game has never been proved, but more than one judge has been assassinated trying to find out!

Careful control on the number of foreigners in the league meant that in the 1970s local talent began to develop. Atletico Nacional of Medellin, another city with a large drugs cartel, even have a policy of only playing Colombian players, and this paid off in May 1989 when the event all Colombians had been waiting for occurred. Nacional won the Copa Libertadores, the first international trophy in the history of the country, amid scenes of unprecedented celebrations.

To the end of the 1994 season

The fortunes of the national team have also risen in the corresponding period. In the 1975 South American Championship, Paraguay, Ecuador and Uruguay were beaten on the way to the final where the Colombians met Peru. Peru eventually won after a play-off in Caracas, but the signs were there that matters were improving. Players of the class of Willington Ortiz were starting to emerge, and by the 1980s the basis of a good national side was there. Under the leadership of Francisco Maturano, who also led Nacional to their Copa Libertadores success, Colombia finished third in the 1987 South American Championships in Argentina.

In 1990, with players like Carlos Valderrama, Alberto Iguaran, Bernardo Redin and the eccentric Rene Higuita in goal, Colombia qualified for the World Cup finals and when pressed, showed they were capable of living with the best. They certainly made their mark on the tournament, especially Higuita who showed goalkeepers how to win over the crowds, if not managers, with his interpretation of a goalkeeping sweeper.

Naturally the 1970s and 1980s have not been without their problems. Originally the 1986 World Cup was to be held in Colombia as recognition of the progress that was being made, but to the disappointment of all Colombians they had to pull out as the facilities and communications were not considered sufficient for a 24-team event.

The drugs problem has been a consistent source of worry, however, not just because of the money aspect. In November 1989, Daniel Ortega made a terrible mistake: he refereed a game honestly, and was assassinated outside the ground for his trouble, as one of the drug gangs had made a large bet on the game and had lost their money. This it seemed was just the tip of the iceberg - many strange refereeing decisions have been put down to bribery. The league was immediately suspended and a clean-up ordered, but it is difficult to do little more than scratch at the surface.

Colombia qualified for the 1994 World Cup, beating Argentina 5-0 in Buenos Aires in the process, but what should have been a national cause for celebration turned into a nightmare. With fears for the safety of the players, not one match was played in Colombia in the lead-up to the finals, yet nobody expected what happened to Andres Escobar. He scored an own goal against the USA as the team were eliminated in the first round, and on his return to Colombia he was gunned down outside a restaurant. First reports stated that his assassin shouted, 'That's for the own goal.' What is certain is that large amounts of betting took place on the game and it seems Escobar was the unwitting victim of another betting ring.

The irony is that before the tournament Colombia were many people's favourites to win the World Cup, such was the progress made by the game there. Whether or not the Colombians can remain at the top is doubtful: in 1993 Higuita was imprisoned for acting as a go-between in a kidnapping, whilst Faustino Asprilla, perhaps Colombia's greatest ever player, was arrested in 1995 for firing a gun in a crowded bar. It was all symptomatic of the chaos into which the game in Colombia is prone to descend.

ECUADOR

'Thank goodness for Colombia' would be a good motto for Ecuadoran football, for if it had not been for victories over their South American neighbours in the Bolivaran Games of 1938 and South American Championships of 1949, Ecuador would have been left without a win in their first twenty years of international football.

Guayaquil, the economic capital and chief port of Ecuador, unsurprisingly saw the first football, and in 1925 the Federación Deportiva Guayaquil was formed, a name later changed to the Federación Deportiva Nacional del Ecuador. This body controlled football as well as other sports, and it was not until 1957, with the creation of the Asociación Ecuatoriana de Fútbol, that football was governed by a separate body. Up until this time there was not much need for one. Regional associations oversaw competitions in all of the major cities, and outings for the international side were restricted to the South American Championships after their debut in the 1938 Bolivaran Games.

To the end of the 1994 season

The formation of the national championship in 1957 was an effort to bring the clubs of Guayaquil and Quito, the capital, into regular competition with each other. There is a fierce rivalry between the two cities, not just in sport, and between them they have won every championship played.

The major clubs from Guayaquil are Barcelona and Emelec, whilst in Quito, high up in the Andes, Deportivo Quito and Nacional Quito are joined by the last of the big five, Liga Deportivo Universitaria. They may dominate Ecuadoran football but their impact on South American football on the whole has been limited. Though semi-finalists in the Copa Libertadores on eight occasions, this has more to do with being grouped in the first round with clubs from either Venezuela or Bolivia than football prowess, with one notable exception.

In 1990, Barcelona made it right the way to the final after beating Progreso from Uruguay, Emelec and most impressively River Plate from Argentina on the way. The semi-final win over River Plate is perhaps the best performance to date by a team from Ecuador even if it did need penalties to separate the teams after the two legs had ended in 1-0 victories for the home sides.

In the final against Olimpia from Paraguay, Barcelona lost the tie in the second half of the first match in Asuncion. There was no way back from a two-goal deficit despite a capacity crowd in the home leg in Guayaquil and they went down 3-1 on aggregate.

Their final appearance does show that football in Ecuador is not stagnating and is showing signs of progress. From being the whipping boys at the South American Championships, though they are not seriously challenging for honours, they are no longer automatic walkovers and in 1989 and 1991 finished above Peru, Bolivia and Venezuela in the final championship rankings. They have come a long way since winning just eight games between 1938 and 1975. In 1993, as hosts of the event for only the third time, they had their best ever finish, reaching the semi-finals before losing to Mexico. They also lost the third place play-off to Colombia but prior to the semi-final defeat they had won six games in a row, a record-breaking feat they had never come close to before.

Ecuador's first entry into the World Cup was not at all successful as they lost heavily to Argentina in the two games played in 1962, but the attempt to qualify for England in 1966 proved to be the closest they have ever come to qualifying. Two of the eight wins they recorded between 1938 and 1975 came against Colombia within the space of five days, and a 2-2 draw with Chile at home meant a draw in Santiago would have seen them through. The 3-1 defeat still meant, however, that they would have to play off. Hopes were high for victory in neutral Lima, but it was not to be as they went down 2-1. Since then they have never seriously threatened to qualify, finishing last in their group on all but two occasions.

Playing that day for Ecuador was their most famous player of all time, Alberto Spencer. He, like most Ecuadorans of repute, ended up playing his football abroad. He made a great reputation for himself throughout South America and Europe with Peñarol, a team he helped to many honours. He also holds the distinctive record of being the record goalscorer in the Copa Libertadores with over 50 goals, a record, like Di Stéfano's in European competitions, that is unlikely to be beaten. Uruguay may have complained in the past of Italians poaching their players and then playing them in the national side, but they were quite capable of doing the same. Spencer ended up not only playing his club football in Uruguay, but he also appeared in the Uruguayan national team.

PARAGUAY

Traditional links with Argentina, Uruguay and Brazil meant that football developed relatively early in Paraguay despite its poverty and isolation, though strangely enough for South America, it is a Dutchman who is credited with first bringing the game to the country.

The Liga Paraguaya de Fútbol, the game's governing body, was formed in 1906 and as the name suggests it was founded to run the league from which it takes its name. Based in Asuncion, the league has been completely dominated by clubs from the capital. Foremost is Olimpia, formed in 1902, the oldest club in the country and by far the most successful. In them Paraguay can boast the fifth most successful club in the Copa Libertadores.

Cerro Porteño, Guarani, Libertad and Nacional are the only other clubs that have done well in a league that has seen a remarkably small shift in power over the years. Only Nacional and Libertad have fallen away, the former winning their last title in 1946. Like the leagues of other small South American countries, Paraguay has been susceptible to the advances of clubs from Brazil, Uruguay and Argentina as they seek to replace players lost to Europe.

Professionalism was introduced in 1935 but has not been a barrier to the flow of players abroad. Asuncion is simply not big enough to support a prosperous club structure. An indication of the uphill struggle clubs in Paraguay face is the fact that with grounds boasting a total capacity of nearly 300,000 within the city, almost half of the present-day population can be accommodated within them at any one time.

The Liga Paraguaya de Fútbol is also responsible for running the national team, though as it took 13 years for a Paraguayan side to take to the field, to begin with its priorities obviously lay with the league. In 1921 Paraguay was the fifth nation to take part in the South American Championships, but despite this long record of participation, along with Colombia and Venezuela they have never hosted the event. Their record in the tournament, though never outstanding, has been consistently good. Their initial match in the 1921 tournament saw a victory over Uruguay, whilst the following year they took Brazil to a play-off before finishing the tournament in second place. History repeated itself in 1949 when Paraguay again forced a play-off against Brazil by beating them on the last day of the tournament. Once again, however, the Brazilians were too strong for the normally resilient Paraguayans and they won 7-0 in convincing fashion.

Aside from the period when they were at war with Bolivia from 1932 until 1935, the national side regularly undertook international games outside the South American Championships. Their debut was made with four friendly games against Argentina in 1919 and that rivalry has continued down the years in the Rosa Chevalier Boutell Cup. Links with Brazil have been maintained through the Oswaldo Cruz Cup and with Uruguay in the Artigas Cup. Matches like these have helped keep the standard of the game up despite the relatively small population.

To the end of the 1994 season

Paraguay finally made their mark in the 1953 South American Championships, winning it for the first time, and were responsible for a tactical innovation that was to change world football. For the 1953 tournament the Paraguayan coach, Fleitas Solich, implemented a 4-2-4 system and they used it to good effect, winning the series after yet another play-off against the Brazilians. So impressed was Feola, the Brazilian coach, that he copied and perfected the system which eventually won the Brazilians the 1958 World Cup.

The irony of the situation was that Paraguay qualified for the tournament in Sweden as well but were knocked out in the first round despite beating Scotland and drawing with Yugoslavia. The late 1940s and 1950s were undoubtedly Paraguay's most successful era at international level and it was not until 1979 that the national side again caught the imagination.

That year turned out to be a memorable one for the country. As well as beating Chile to win the South American Championship for the second time, Olimpia won the Copa Libertadores, the first club from outside of the continent's big three to achieve such a feat. Boca Juniors, the reigning champions, were beaten 2-0 over two legs and to complete an amazing quadruple, Olimpia won the ensuing Inter-American club championship by beating Deportivo FAS of El Salvador as well as the World Club Championship against Malmö of Sweden, who were deputising for Nottingham Forest. Paraguay was therefore in possession of every continental trophy available.

Olimpia have continued to do well in the Copa Libertadores. Having been finalists in the first competition in 1960, they appeared in their third final in 1989, this time losing to Nacional Medellin of Colombia. They were back again in 1990 and won for the second time by beating Barcelona 3-1 on aggregate. That year also saw Olimpia win the South American Super Cup and as a result they were awarded the Recopa, a trophy for the winners of the annual game between the Copa Libertadores and Super Cup winners. There was a third consecutive final appearance in 1991 but once again it was to prove a disappointing experience as Colo Colo became the first Chilean club to win the tournament.

Should a South American Super League ever become a reality, Olimpia would undoubtedly be involved. Despite the national side's qualification for the 1986 World Cup in Mexico, their first appearance since 1958, it is Olimpia that all Paraguayans look to in the search for honours.

PERU

Peru are a middle-ranking South American power noted most for the fine teams they fielded during the 1970s. The rest of their footballing history has been largely undistinguished, and as one of the poorest nations on the continent with bad political problems, the Peruvians have struggled in recent years.

Though football was played at the turn of the century by British residents and a league of sorts formed in Lima in 1912, it was not until 1922 that the Federación Peruana de Fútbol was founded in the same city. Four years later the Liga Nacional de Football was introduced, though it was not strictly a national league as only clubs from the Lima area were invited to take part.

Until the introduction of a proper national league in 1966, the league in Lima was the strongest and its winners were regarded as national champions. In 1972, further changes were introduced. A metropolitan league for the area around Lima was instituted and a complex network of regional leagues set up to qualify teams for a final decentralised tournament to find the national champions.

The strongest teams have traditionally been from Lima and include Alianza (the club of the poor), Universitario (the club of the rich), Sporting Cristal and from nearby Callao, Sport Boys, though since the league has opened up, teams from the regions have begun to make their presence felt more and more, even if as yet they do not constitute a great threat to the capital.

The national side made its debut in the 1927 South American Championships which the Peruvian federation had been given the privilege of organising. Home advantage counted for little although Bolivia, who had made their debut in the previous year's tournament, were beaten. Lima was often used as a venue for the tournament and in 1939 Peru made home advantage count.

Spurred on by their greatest player of these early years, Teodoro 'Lolo' Fernández, the Peruvians beat all four of their opponents to win the tournament, although of the big three only Uruguay were present. Entry into the initial World Cup did not result in any progress, but three years before their South American Championship success, and again with Fernandez at the helm, Peru had made an impact, though not of the right kind, at the 1936 Olympic Games in Berlin.

Professionalism had been introduced in 1931, but the Peru team that made the journey to Berlin was the strongest at their disposal. They comprehensively beat Finland in the first round but were then involved in an extraordinary game against Austria. With Peru winning 4-2 near the end of extra-time, the game was abandoned after a melee stemming from a misunderstanding over an Austrian substitution. The game was ordered to be replayed but the Peru team were told not to turn up to the game by their embassy who considered the decision unjust, and they returned home.

There was little progress made in the game and even the emergence of a number of great players in the late 1950s including Gomez Sanchez, Mosquera, Loyaza, Seminario and Joya did little to help the cause. A famous victory over England in 1959 only helped speed up the flow of players to Europe and other South American countries where the conditions for players were much better. Seminario and Mosquera made names for themselves in Spain and Portugal, whilst Joya, Gomez Sanchez and Loyaza were very successful in Argentina.

Peru will primarily be remembered for the great sides of the 1970s. Guided by the greatest Peruvian footballer of all time, Teofilo Cubillas, Peru were in great form in the 1970 World Cup, and if they had not met Brazil in the quarter-finals they might have progressed further. Surprisingly eliminated in the 1974 qualifiers after a play-off with Chile, they made up for that defeat by winning the 1975 South American Championships, beating Brazil in the semi-finals and Colombia in the final.

Qualification for the 1978 and 1982 World Cup finals did not see the team perform as well as they had done in the first half of the 1970s, especially in Spain in 1982. Cubillas was still in the team but it was his swansong in the international game. The 1978 tournament will be remembered for the Peru-Argentina game in the second round. The Peruvians had played some excellent football in the first round, but collapsed in the second, especially against Argentina against whom they lost 6-0. The result was greeted with cries of 'cheat' from Brazil who were eliminated as a result, though it seems unlikely that Peru actually threw the game. The result had more to do with inept organisation which saw Brazil's game with Poland and the Peru-Argentina game scheduled for different times, thereby allowing the Argentines the advantage of knowing exactly how many goals they needed to score to proceed to the final.

The 1980s and early 1990s have on the whole been a very poor time for the country as political violence has gone hand in hand with economic stagnation. Peru are in danger of losing their traditional standing in South America and joining the likes of Venezuela as also-rans. The 1990 World Cup qualifiers saw them finish bottom of their group, while since 1984 in the Copa Libertadores, never a happy hunting ground for their clubs, the Peruvian entrants have made the bottom two places in the first round their own.

URUGUAY

Uruguay would seem to be in the dying throes of its status as a world power. Colombia looks set to replace it as one of the big three on the continent, and with a population that is ten times as large, perhaps this should not be too surprising. It would be wrong to write the Uruguayans off, however. Two World Cup titles, two Olympic titles - at a time that they were in effect the world championships - continuing success in the Copa America and eight South American club titles is not a record to be trifled with.

Football in Uruguay is really football in Montevideo, as all the major clubs are located within the city. Montevideo is just across the River Plate estuary from Buenos Aires, and these two cities formed the heartland of South American football at the beginning of the century. Like in Argentina, the English introduced the game to Uruguay. William Poole, an English professor at Montevideo University, formed Albion Football Club in 1886, whilst English workers on the Central Uruguayan Railway formed in 1891 a club that became known by the name of the district within which it was located, Peñarol. 1899 saw the merger of two clubs, Montevideo FC and Defensa, under the name of Nacional, and they along with Peñarol have dominated the game in a manner matched perhaps only by Rangers and Celtic in Scotland. Out of 88 league championships they have won all bar 16 and finished in second spot in all bar 20, a remarkable achievement. In the period from 1915 to 1977, only Rampla Juniors in 1927 and Wanderers in 1931 managed to wrest the title from them.

Given the predictability of much of the domestic fare, international football has always been of prime importance to the Uruguayans. The formation of a football association in 1900, at the behest of Peñarol and Nacional, saw not only the start of a league championship but also the formation of a national selection. On 16 May 1901 a representative side met an Argentine combination in Montevideo for the first ever international match played outside the British Isles.

Uruguay and Argentina have met more times than any other international pairing over the years due to their proximity and relative isolation. The Lipton and Newton Cups were an almost annual event and two trophies donated by each country's Ministry of Education were another source for friendly games. The most notable rivalry, however, has been in the South American Championships.

Though not an official championship, the tournament in 1910 set the standard for future events as both Argentina and Uruguay easily saw off the challenge of Chile to set up a deciding last game. The rivalry even then was huge and the original game had to be postponed until the following day as excited fans burnt down one of the grandstands!

Uruguay lost the match 4-1 to an in-form Argentine side, their goal scored by their most famous player in these early years, José Piendibene, the Peñarol centre-forward who played for the club from 1908 to 1930 and for the national side until 1921. Indeed he was the motivating force behind Uruguay's win in the next South American Championship, held in Buenos Aires again in 1916.

The golden age of Uruguayan football came just after Piendibene's retirement from international football when for over a decade Uruguay reigned supreme in the world. The 'Celeste', as they are known on account of their sky blue shirts, won the equivalent of three world championships with their victories in the 1924 and 1928 Olympic Games and their triumph in the first World Cup in 1930. The side that achieved these incredible feats was in essence the same throughout the whole period.

Captain and mentor was José Nasazzi and he was joined in defence by Pedro Arispe. In front of them they could rely on a midfield known as 'la costilla metalica', the iron curtain, consisting of José Andrade, Lorenzo Fernandez and Alvaro Gestido, whilst their attack was the most potent in the world with four of the most outstanding goalscorers of the time, Hector Castro, Pedro Petrone, Pedro Cea and most importantly Hector Scarone.

The Uruguayans took Europe by storm in 1924, delighting the Parisian crowds with their skill. They never looked in danger, beating Yugoslavia, America, France, Holland and then Switzerland in the final, scoring 20 goals in the process and conceding only two. In 1928 Europe knew what to expect but still could not cope, and just to emphasise the superiority of the River Plate Uruguay met their rivals Argentina in the final. Taken to a replay, the Celeste made no mistake in the second game and were crowned as Olympic Champions for the second time.

The 1930 World Cup triumph was the crowning glory of the side as they won the first edition on their own soil. Despite a poor European turn-out, it is generally agreed that Uruguay would have won whoever had made the trip. In the magnificent new Centenario stadium, built for the World Cup and to celebrate 100 years of independence, neither Peru or Romania were a match for the hosts in the first round. Neither were Yugoslavia in the semi-finals and they were brushed aside 6-1, setting the stage for a repeat of the 1928 Olympic final.

Once again the Uruguayans were triumphant, winning 4-2 after having been 2-1 down at half-time, and José Nasazzi became the first recipient of the Jules Rimet Cup. The victory signalled an extraordinary hiatus in the fixtures of the national side. Uruguay refused to make the journey to Italy to defend their title four years later and also declined to take part in 1938. There was not much action in the South American Championships either during the 1930s, and it was not until the early 1940s that the national side began playing regularly again.

This may have been due in part to the chaos at club level in the early 1930s caused by professionalism. As an issue, professionalism had been simmering since 1922 when Peñarol caused a split in the Association over payments to their players, and the situation was not resolved until 1932 when professionalism was legalised.

Professionalism has been a bitter-sweet pill for Uruguayan football. Without it they would have fallen behind their rivals, but it caused many disputes. All the clubs except Peñarol and Nacional could not afford it, and even the big two were hard pushed to pay the high wages expected by the players. A strike in 1949 lead to a large exodus, primarily to Colombia, whilst in the same year Peñarol would not release their players for the South American Championship, and the national team consequently finished a miserable sixth out of the eight teams taking part.

All was forgiven the following year as the national side, back at full strength, won the World Cup in neighbouring Brazil against all the odds. Bolivia were dispatched in the first round but in the final pool Uruguay were not expected to match the form of the Brazilians, who were scoring freely. The omens were not good after a draw with Spain in the first game, and despite a close win over Sweden, the Uruguayans had to beat Brazil in the Maracana to top the table and win the title.

To the end of the 1994 season

When they fell behind to a Friaca goal early in the second half all looked lost, but in one of the most spirited comebacks of all time, first Schiaffino and then Ghiggia turned the Brazilians' world upside down to secure the victory. Uruguay were World Cup winners for a second time and had yet to lose a match in the tournament.

Four years later they travelled to Europe for the first time in the World Cup, and along with Hungary were regarded as the best team in the tournament. Indeed their semi-final defeat at the hands of the Magyars is often regarded as one of the best games of football ever played and would have made a perfect final. The stars of the early 1950s and the second great team that Uruguay had built were Juan Schiaffino, probably the most famous Uruguayan player ever, Victor Andrade, nephew of the great José Andrade of the 1930 team, Roque Maspoli in goal, Obdulio Varela, at centre-half the linchpin of the side, and Omar Miguez, the team's main goalscorer.

The sides of the 1920s and early 1950s have proved a heavy burden since as successive Uruguayan sides have failed to live up to this pedigree. The 1970 World Cup side containing Luis Cubilla, Ladislao Mazurkiewicz, Juan Mujica, Roberto Matosas and Pedro Rocha came close, but the reputation of that team lay more in the roots of club football than in the national side.

The year 1960 was a crucial one in Uruguayan football, for the new Copa Libertadores gave a new lease of life to both Peñarol and Nacional. All of a sudden they found themselves in the international spotlight. Peñarol have qualified for all but eight of the editions played, whilst Nacional have missed out on only 12, and between them they have appeared in 15 finals, winning eight of them. Peñarol were the inaugural winners and after Independiente are the second most successful club in the history of the tournament. Nacional, winners for the first time in 1971, rank third on the list.

Though often a shop window for the agents of the big European clubs, the Copa Libertadores has added spice to a somewhat predictable Uruguayan championship. All of the major clubs are located within Montevideo and until the 1970s clubs from outside did not take part in the the league. Since the reorganisation of the league the power of both Nacional and Peñarol has been slowly curtailed. Winners every season between 1932 and 1975, their stranglehold was first broken in 1976 by Defensor, but the decline has been most notable since the latter 1980s, including a run of five years when neither team won it.

With many of the best players moving abroad due to the perilous financial state of most Uruguayan clubs, the national team has struggled to retain its position at the top of the football hierarchy. Despite winning the 1983 and 1987 South American Championships thanks to players of the calibre of Enzo Francescoli and Carlos Aguilera, and repeating the feat on home territory in 1995 to give renewed hope for the future, the famous Celeste will have their work cut out not to be remembered only as the country that won a couple of world championships in the distant past.

VENEZUELA

Venezuela is the weakest of all the ten South American countries and the only one in which football is not the national sport, that accolade falling to baseball. Oil resources mean that Venezuela is a relatively prosperous country, but although there is now a professional league, progress has been slow and the standard does not look like matching that of either Ecuador or Bolivia in the near future.

Historically Venezuela has more in common with football in Central America than in South America and it was to the Confederacion Centroamericano y del Caribe de Futbol that they affiliated in 1938. The Federación Venezolana de Fútbol had been founded 12 years previously in Caracas, although the first organised competition stretches back five years prior to that.

In 1921 a group of Caracas-based clubs set up their own league which was taken over by the new federation in 1926, and despite a break-away in 1929 when two leagues were in operation, the national amateur league continued to operate until the major reorganisation of 1956, the date when professionalism was legalised.

The national side made its debut in the 1938 Central American and Caribbean Games and later in the same year took part in the Bolivaran Games in Barranquilla but did not play regularly until the mid-1960s, reflecting the low priority attached to the game by the population as a whole.

The professional league gave rise to a whole new breed of clubs, which as their names suggest - Portugues, Deportivo Italia - are run loosely along ethnic lines, a factor that further alienates the sport from the general public. There are a surprising number of foreign players in the league, but attendances remain low. Success in the Copa Libertadores has been restricted to three semi-final appearances between 1977 and 1984, but on each occasion the Venezuelan team has finished bottom of their semi-final group.

Honours have been spread evenly among the clubs and, surprisingly, among the cities in Venezuela. Caracas has found its dominant position challenged in particular by San Cristobal and Mérida, especially since the beginning of the 1980s as teams like Deportivo Tachira and Estudiantes Mérida have forced the Caracas teams like Deportivo Italia, Galicia and Portugues into the background.

Entry into the 1966 World Cup was the country's first real taste of international competition, and was followed the year after by their first appearance in the South American Championships. They surprisingly finished above Bolivia in that tournament but have been last in every tournament since. Fixtures are almost exclusively in both of these competitions, for which Venezuela are now regular entrants.

If Venezuela are to make any strides in world football they will have to improve on a record that shows just one win in the South American Championships, against Bolivia in 1967, and two in the World Cup qualifiers, against Bolivia in 1981 and Ecuador in 1993.

AFRICA

WORLD SOCCER

Africa can safely be regarded as the 'New Continent' of world football, and if the 20th century was a tale of Europe and South America, the 21st could see Africa rise to the top of the pile. In the early 1960s it was predicted that an African country would win the World Cup by the end of the century. One still might, but the likelihood would have been greatly increased had a fairer number of places been allotted to the continent in the final tournament. The allocation has increased from one to two in 1982, three for 1994, and will be five in 1998, but with 51 members, the one in ten chance of qualifying afforded to African countries still compares unfavourably with the one in two chance the South Americans have.

Football in Africa is really a tale of the second half of the century, for not until the shackles of colonialism had been thrown off in the 1960s was there any serious movement to organise the game. Until that point, football in sub-Saharan Africa, especially, was organised from the Football Association in London or the French Federation in Paris, Britain and France being the two major colonial powers on the continent.

African football has traditionally been strongest in the area north of the Sahara desert. The Egyptians, for instance, have had a football association since 1921 and qualified for the World Cup finals as long ago as 1934. Six years previously they even reached the semi-finals of the football tournament of the Olympic Games. Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia also have leagues dating from the 1920s. Only Ghana, Nigeria and Zaire, formerly the Belgian Congo, can claim the same for 'Black Africa'.

The year 1957 was a key one for Africa. Not only was the Confédération Africaine de Football formed, but Ghana, under Kwame Nkrumah, lit the torch of African awareness by gaining independence from Britain. As nation after nation broke away from their European rulers, a football revolution was triggered, the ramifications of which are just beginning to be felt.

The highlight to date remains the performance of Cameroon in the 1990 World Cup in Italy when they reached the quarter-finals, although their performance was not the first outstanding one by an African country in a World Cup, nor the last. Algeria were good enough to beat the eventual finalists, West Germany, in 1982 in Spain, whilst Morocco four years later won their first round group ahead of England, Portugal and Poland, before going out to a last-minute goal against the West Germans in the second round. There was similar misfortune for the Nigerians in 1994 when they were denied a place in the quarter-finals by a last-minute goal from Italy's Roberto Baggio.

The population in Africa is growing fast. Nigeria, for example, currently has a population of just under 120 million, but by the year 2010 it will have grown to an estimated 220 million. The population of the continent as a whole is expected to rise from the present 600 million to over 1600 million by the year 2025. This, coupled with the fact that football is unrivalled in the affections of the majority of Africans, makes for an exciting scenario.

Perhaps more than any other regional body, the African Football Confederation has been crucial to the development of football in the countries under its wing. The concept of forming the CAF was first realised at the 1954 World Cup and it came to fruition in 1957 at the Grand Hotel in Khartoum. The Charter members were the four African countries who by that stage had independent football associations: Egypt, Ethiopia, South Africa and Sudan.

At the same time as this meeting, the first African Cup of Nations was held at the new stadium in Khartoum and one of the three pillars of CAF policy was established. The African Cup of Champion Clubs followed seven years later, and the African Cup Winners Cup 11 years after that. These three competitions have been vital in helping the spread of football in Africa, and in overcoming the barriers that both poverty and the great distances involved in travelling to matches present. In 1992 a third club tournament was launched, the CAF Cup, similar to the UEFA and CONMEBOL Cups in that it is for the best of the rest. The CAF also presides over two youth tournaments and the football tournament of the All-African Games.

Poverty is an ever-increasing factor, as Africa is now the only continent which is poorer than it was twenty years ago. Famine has swept through areas of the north-east, as well as other parts of the continent, and bloody civil wars have erupted. This makes for an often harsh environment for football to operate in, but they are factors which African football will have to overcome. Perhaps the biggest obstacle that Africa has to face, though, is that of improving facilities. Too much of the money made by football is lost to corrupt officials, and little gets spent on proper pitches, training facilities or decent stadia. Clubs are too often reliant on the whims of a rich sponsor or the goodwill of the government to pay wages and travelling expenses. Until clubs become self-sufficient, little will change.

Club football is crucial to the development of the game. Already there is a comprehensive club structure in most countries that can accommodate the large number of excellent players being produced. The next challenge is to keep these players from being tempted abroad in vast numbers by creating the wealth in the game to reward them. Far too many go to France and Belgium and end up playing for second-rate clubs just to earn a living. For every Abedi Pele and George Weah at the top of the ladder there are scores of other Africans wasting away in the mediocrity of the French second division.

The exodus does have two positive effects, however. First, it brings more tactical awareness to the national sides when the exiles return for competitions like the Cup of Nations, and second, it also provides the basis of a future generation of African coaches with international experience. Of the 12 teams taking part in the 1992 Cup of Nations, half were coached by foreigners. If a proportion of the 250 Africans currently employed by European clubs can return at some stage and help develop the game in their homeland, Africa will eventually see the benefits.

No-one is expecting every African country to produce teams capable of winning the World Cup, but in Algeria, Cameroon, Egypt, Ghana, Ivory Coast, Kenya, Morocco, Nigeria, Senegal, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe and now South Africa, Africa already has a very strong frontline of states ready to challenge for honours worldwide.

THE AFRICAN CUP OF NATIONS

The African Cup of Nations is the showpiece of African football and is held every two years in a designated country. For many years a simple knock-out qualifying tournament was used to reduce the number of entrants to just eight finalists, but for the 1992 tournament in Senegal it was decided to increase the number of finalists to twelve. For the 1996 event that has been increased further to sixteen. The hosts and previous winners have always received a bye into the final tournament. Since 1992 the qualifying competition has been organised on a group basis rather than a knock-out formula.

The first finals took place in Khartoum at the same time as the formation of the Confédération Africaine de Football. South Africa were initially involved and were drawn against Ethiopia in the semi-finals, but only agreed to send either an all-black or all-white team. CAF insisted on a multi-racial one and so the South Africans withdrew and until they were readmitted to the confederation in 1992 they played no part in African football.

The first five editions were confined to only ten different entrants and did not involve any qualifying rounds. Egypt won the first two tournaments and reached the final of the third having played only six matches, so small was the number of entries at the time. Ghana won the fourth tournament in 1963 and were the dominant power for the rest of the decade, winning again in 1965 and reaching the final in 1968 and 1970. In 1965 a regulation was passed allowing each nation to play only two overseas-based players. This rule remained in force until 1982 when, due to the increasing numbers of players earning their living abroad, it was felt that the value of the tournament was being undermined.

In 1968 the formula for the tournament was changed to cope with the increasing number of countries wishing to take part. A qualifying round was introduced and the number of finalists increased to eight. The countries surrounding the river Congo were the first to make their mark in the new-style tournament. Congo Kinshasa, as Zaire was previously known, won in 1968; their smaller neighbours, the Congo, were victorious in 1972, and in 1974, having qualified for the World Cup, Zaire went to West Germany as African champions after winning their second title in Egypt.

The biggest surprise of the 1970s was the failure of Guinea's national side to add to the many honours won by their clubs. They came close in 1976, finishing second behind Morocco, who themselves have never really shone despite qualifying for the World Cup on two occasions. That 1976 win remains their only triumph, and is in line with a poor showing generally by the North African countries, the real powers in club football. Egypt in 1986 and Algeria in 1990 both won on home ground, but neither they, Morocco nor Tunisia seem to travel well.

Since the late 1970s, West Africa has been the dominant force. Ghana regained some of their previous form by winning two further titles, which leaves them, with four titles, as clear overall leaders, whilst Cameroon and Nigeria have been especially powerful since 1980. The Nigerians have won twice and lost in the final three times, twice against Cameroon, who, had they not lost to Egypt on penalties in 1986, would have been the first team to claim a hat-trick of titles.

Release of players from European clubs has often been a problem, but by moving the tournament to January, when much of Europe is in a mid-season break, the problem has been alleviated. Television companies around the world have begun to take the Cup of Nations seriously, the presence of famous names from European football undoubtedly being the spur, and the future of the competition looks brighter than ever.

OTHER TOURNAMENTS

CAF also organises two youth championships which act as qualifying competitions for the world events. The youth cup is the longest running of the two, dating from 1979. For the 1991 edition, its format was changed from being purely a knock-out event to include qualifying rounds and a final tournament. It is now known as the Junior Nations Cup.

The 1995 Under-17 championship was the first to be organised at that age-level. Previously teams had taken part in a qualifying tournament for the World Championship, but it was nothing more than that and no overall winner emerged.

AFRICAN CLUB COMPETITIONS

African club competitions centre around three CAF-organised tournaments, the African Cup of Champion Clubs, the African Cup Winners Cup and the CAF Cup. The Champions Cup is open to the league champions of each country, the Cup Winners Cup to the winners of the main knockout tournament in each country, and the CAF Cup to the best of the rest. In each case the previous year's winners are entitled to defend their title.

The African Cup of Champion Clubs is now a major feature on the calendar of world football. It had always been the intention of the African Football Confederation to promote club football, but in 1957 not many clubs were in a position to play teams from other cities, let alone other countries. Not until 1964 did a Champions Cup seem remotely feasible. Leagues were springing up in every country following independence, and representatives of 14 of them played off for the right to be represented in the first edition, to be staged in Ghana. In that historic three-day tournament in Accra, Oryx Douala from Cameroon beat not only the hosts Real Republicans, who were in effect the Ghanaian national side, but also Stade Malien to win the first title.

Very much influenced by the organisation of the European Cup, the format was changed for the second edition two years later. Each tie was to be contested on a home and away basis with the highest aggregate scorers qualifying for the next round. In the event of these being tied, the number of away goals would be the deciding factor, and in the final resort, penalties. Unlike the European Cup, however, the final was to be staged over two legs, as a neutral venue was thought unlikely to attract a big enough crowd.

The tournament has gone through two very distinct phases. Until the early 1980s sub-Saharan clubs were pre-eminent. Since then, however, North African teams have been totally dominant, a pattern that has also been reflected in the Cup Winners Cup. The early years of the Champions Cup had been dominated by the clubs of West and Central Africa. TP Englebert, later renamed TP Mazembe, appeared in four of the first six finals and another club from Zaire, Vita Kinshasa, won the tournament in 1973. Ghana was also well represented, particularly by the great Asante Kotoko club who, like TP Englebert, appeared in four finals, although they only emerged victorious once.

The competition really came to life in the early 1970s, with Cameroon and Guinea the major forces of the time. Canon Yaoundé, Union Douala and Tonnerre Yaoundé (from Cameroon) and Hafia and Horoya Conakry (Guinea) all made their names in this period. Hafia Conakry were especially dominant, appearing in five Champions Cup finals between 1972 and 1978 with a team that was feared throughout the continent. The attacking line-up of Petit Sory, Papa Camara, Bangaly Sylla, Cherif Soulayeman, N'Jolea, Tollo and Jansky has perhaps yet to be equalled in African club football.

Before the 1980s, sides from North Africa had shown little interest in the club competitions. Al Ismaili won the Champions Cup in 1969 but were not regarded as the best Egyptian team, whilst Mouloudia Algiers won the cup for Algeria in 1976. The eighties saw the North Africans begin to realise what they were missing out on, and fairly soon they made their mark. Asante Kotoko's win in the 1983 Champions Cup marks the last occasion on which the trophy was held by a sub-Saharan nation.

The Cup Winners Cup too has been the domain of the North Africans since the early 1980s. Al Ahly from Cairo, who have emerged as one of the finest clubs Africa has produced, won the competition three years on the trot, the only club to have achieved such a feat. On the third occasion they actually gave up their place in the Champions Cup to take part, but they returned to the champions' event the following year and promptly won that as well. This was all on top of a victory and a final appearance in the Champions Cup in 1981 and 1982: six years, six final appearances and five victories!

They were not the only North Africans at it. Zamalek, their great Cairo rivals, have won the Champions Cup three times, whilst their compatriots Al Makoaloum have won the Cup Winners Cup twice. Clubs from Tunisia, Algeria and Morocco too, have all contributed to this phenomenal success. It is up to the sub-Saharan Africans to match the very professional club structure of their rivals in the north, and there are signs that this is indeed occurring. The Nigerians are beginning to make their presence felt, and as the largest country on the continent they have definitely been the major underachievers to date at club level, with only five titles to their name.

The hope is that the African champions will soon be invited to take part in the World Club Championship with the winners of the European Cup and Copa Libertadores. Certainly, there is little reason for their continued exclusion.

To the end of the 1994 tournaments

REGIONAL TOURNAMENTS IN AFRICA

Because of the huge size of the continent, regional tournaments have always been popular in Africa. The African Football Confederation divides its members up into five groupings based on geographical and historical links, and the five controlling bodies organise the tournaments under their jurisdiction. The only exception to this is North Africa, where links with the Middle East are strong and the Arab Football Union organises a Champions Cup, a Cup Winners Cup and a tournament for the national teams in which North African sides are invited to compete.

The area with the most established tournaments is East Africa, where the Gossage Cup dates back to 1927. It was there, too, that the first regional club competitions took place outside of North Africa, with the introduction of the East and Central African Club Championship in 1974. Given their lack of success at pan-African level, this tournament has proved to be a mainstay of club football in East Africa. The same could be said for the tournament for national sides; under its present format the East and Central African Senior Challenge Cup has been played since 1973, though its predecessor dates back a further eight years.

An area that is just developing is Southern Africa. Due to the political difficulties in the region, Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe have historically been part of the East African body. With the new regime in South Africa, however the trio have joined the potentially powerful Southern African Football Confederation, though they have yet to play anything other than youth tournaments.

The weakest of the regional bodies is the Central African Association, with the UDEAC tournament for national sides being the only regular competition it organises. The West African Football Union has perhaps the biggest task of them all, with more members than any other and a large area under its control. Tournaments for the national sides are sub-divided into even smaller regions, although the West African Club Championship is open to everyone. It is a very prestigious tournament and has been held every year since 1977.

NORTH AFRICA

North Africa has for many years been the closest link the rest of the world has had with African football. Their leagues are among the oldest on the continent, their national teams have been playing longer, and in players like Larbi Ben Barek, Just Fontaine and Rachid Mekhloufi, North Africa provided Europe with some fine players even before the flood gates opened in the 1970s. Proximity to Europe has also been a telling factor in the organisation of football in Egypt, Libya, Algeria, Morocco and Tunisia, the countries which make up the region. Egypt entered the 1920 Olympic Games and featured regularly in competitions before the Second World War, whilst French North Africa, though excluded from international competition, had a lively domestic scene.

Egypt was the first African country to join FIFA, two years after the founding of its football association in 1921, and as the only independent nation on the continent, apart from the remote Liberia, continued to be the sole African representative until Sudan joined in 1948. Few would dispute that club football in Egypt is the strongest in Africa. A year after the Egyptian Football Association was formed, the Farouk Cup was introduced and until 1949, when the national league was formed, this was the main competition. After that date it became known simply as the Cup of Egypt, and like the league it has been dominated by the clubs from Cairo, in particular Al Ahly and Zamalek.

Zamalek and Al Ahly regularly attract crowds of 100,000 to the International Stadium for matches against each other, and it is because of support like this that they have been able to prosper. On only seven occasions in its entire history has the Egyptian league been won by another team. To emphasise their superiority, between them they have won nine African club titles. Only Al Makoualoum have risen to challenge this hegemony, and they too have won an African club title.

Algeria has a good league set-up although, unlike in Egypt, the composition of clubs now differs greatly from when the league started. Algeria was the largest state in French North Africa and had three leagues operational on its territory, one based in each of Algiers, Oran and Constantine. The winners of these league and cup competitions used to take part in the North African Club Championship and the North African Cup respectively, along with their counterparts in Morocco and Tunisia, the other two states under French rule. Since independence there has only been one league in Algeria and it has produced the top team in Africa on four occasions. JS Kabylie twice, Entente Setif and Mouloudia Challia from Algiers have all won the African Cup of Champion Clubs.

Club names are prone to change in Algeria depending on the political mood. JS Kabylie for instance were known as JE Tizi-Ouzou for many years in an attempt to curb regional sentiments - Kabylie is the area of the Berbers and they were using the club to vent their feelings. Politics in Algerian football is not new; at the time of the struggle for independence, many of the great Algerian footballers of the time joined up with the FLN team which acted as a focus for anti-French feeling by touring Africa and playing matches. In 1977 a massive reorganisation was undertaken whereby all clubs were attached to a major industrial concern. Mouloudia Challia thereby became known as Mouloudia Petrioliers, as they were attached to the national oil company, though all the clubs have recently reverted to their pre-1977 names.

Nowhere in Africa can match the political interference that has taken place in Libyan football, however, as two examples serve to show. In the 1984 Cup Winners Cup, Al Ahly of Tripoli, against the odds, reached the final where they were due to meet their namesakes from Cairo. But at that time Egypt and Libya were not on good terms politically and so the Libyans refused to turn up in Cairo, forfeiting their place to Canon Yaounde. On the other hand, in a case perhaps unique in football, Libya withdrew from a qualifying tie in the 1990 World Cup against Algeria as a token of gratitude for Algerian support after the bombing of Tripoli by the United States. Quite what the capacity crowd waiting for the game to start in the Tripoli Stadium thought about such a magnanimous gesture is not known.

Both Morocco and Tunisia, the other North African countries, can lay claim to excellent club sides. Tunisia, despite its small size, won the Champions Cup with Club Africain in 1991 and Esperance in 1994, and the Cup Winners Cup in 1988 with CA Bizerte. In Morocco the network of clubs is extremely well distributed geographically, unlike most of Africa where all the big clubs tend to be located in the capital, and perhaps the second largest city. There are major clubs in all of the big Moroccan cities: Marrakech, Rabat, Casablanca, Kenitra, Oujda, Fes and Mohammedia can all boast championship-winning sides. Only three clubs, however, have gone on to win the African Cup of Champion Clubs, FAR Rabat in 1985, Raja Casablanca in 1989 and Wydad Casablanca in 1992.

It is not only with its club sides that North Africa has won renown in recent years. Morocco in 1970, 1986 and 1994, Tunisia in 1978, Algeria in 1982 and 1986, and Egypt in 1990 have all qualified for the World Cup finals. Only Cameroon, Nigeria and Zaire have managed to do the same in the whole of the rest of Africa. Once there, North Africa's representatives have invariably made their mark on the tournament. In 1970 Morocco gave the West Germans a shock in the first round before losing 2-1, and managed to hold Bulgaria to a draw. Sixteen years later in Mexico they qualified for the second round, topping their group ahead of England, Poland and Portugal before West Germany once again denied them, this time with a last-minute winner.

Tunisia had kept up the good work in 1978, beating Mexico convincingly - the first ever win by an African side in the World Cup finals - and holding West Germany to a draw, but Algeria gave perhaps the best performance of the lot in 1982 and again West Germany were involved. In a thrilling match in Gijón the Algerians, inspired by Lakdar Belloumi and Rabah Madjer, two of the finest African footballers of all time, beat the West Germans 2-1. A further victory over Chile almost assured them of a second round place, which they were denied only by a wicked piece of gamesmanship by Austria and Germany, who contrived to see all three teams finish on four points. Algeria, with the worst goal difference, lost out and went home justifiably crying 'cheat'.

Given this success in the World Cup, it is surprising that the North Africans have not done better in the Cup of Nations. Egypt have won on three occasions, but two of these were in the first two tournaments when there were only three participants. Their other victory was on home soil in 1986. Algeria did likewise in 1990, their only win to date, whilst Morocco's sole triumph came in Ethiopia in 1976.

For so long the major force in African football, there can be no doubt that the region's dominance is being eroded, with West Africa and South Africa set to challenge its position. At the 1992 Cup of Nations all three North African representatives finished bottom of their first round groups and were eliminated, leaving all eight quarter-finalists hailing from south of the Sahara, and in 1994 seven of the eight quarter-finalists were black African, even though the tournament was held in Tunisia. It may be some while, however, before North Africa can be similarly matched at club level. Unlike the rest of the continent, their best players tend to stay at home and this gives them a huge advantage.

WEST AFRICA

West Africa is a patchwork of large and small nations consisting of 16 countries, although CAF sub-divides the area into a Zone A and Zone B. There are five powerful football states among these nations: Côte d'Ivoire, Guinea, Ghana, Nigeria and Senegal. The rest are by no means football outcasts, but as of yet have not proved themselves in the club tournaments or the Cup of Nations. Ghana and Nigeria are the most renowned and remain the only African countries to have won world titles at any level. Nigeria were World Under-17 champions in 1985 and 1993, whilst Ghana won the same title in 1991 and the World Youth Cup in 1993. Football came with British rule and was quick to spread through both countries. By the 1920s football was popular enough amongst the locals for leagues to be formed in many of the towns, helped along by British organisation.

In Ghana, the most famous of the teams formed around this time were Hearts of Oak (1911) of Accra, Asante Kotoko (1926) based in Kumasi and Eleven Wise (1919) in Sekondi. Due to poor communications, competitions did not take on a nationwide character until the late 1950s when a national league and cup were introduced for the first time. Instead tournaments were organised for teams in a town or region. Asante Kotoko, for instance, made their name in the Asanthene Cup where they had a great rivalry with Cornerstones of Kumasi. In Accra, the City Championship Cup was the domain of both Hearts of Oak and Steadfast.

Independence saw the creation of the Ghana Football Association, taking over from the Gold Coast Football Association which had been formed in 1922. It was responsible for the implementation of the new league and cup and for fielding a national side. Because of the head start Ghana had, they were the most successful nation in Africa in the 1960s. In an age of footballing innocence, Ghanaian footballers such as Baba Yara, Ibrahim Sunday, Robert Mensah and Wilberforce Mfum were the toast of African football, but it is a legacy that has been hard to live up to. The 'Black Stars', as the national side is known, have managed to do reasonably well, and despite some lapses and the surprising failure to qualify for a World Cup, they have remained at the forefront of the game in Africa. Nations Cup wins in 1978 and 1982 are testament to this.

Nigeria, on the other hand, have not found the task so easy. With a vast population and huge oil resources, the Nigerians were expected to be leading the pack by a long way. Unlike Ghana, however, Nigeria did not have a well-founded club structure from the beginning, and clubs are still prone to fade away. There have been no Asante Kotokos blazing a trail for the rest to follow. Another factor was the late formation, in 1945, of the Nigeria Football Association, which came 23 years after its counterpart in Ghana. The Challenge Cup was introduced in that year and until the national league was formed in 1972 it remained the only nationwide competition. It is still regarded by some as the top competition in the country. This may perhaps help explain the greater success of Nigerian teams in the Cup Winners Cup compared to the Champions Cup.

Only since the 1970s has Nigerian football begun to progress rapidly, and the focus for its development was club football. Outside of Lagos, representative teams had always entered the Challenge Cup but in 1970, due to the huge increase in the number of clubs being formed throughout the country, it became a clubs-only competition. In 1972 the next important step was taken when the national league was formed and it has always been well represented by clubs from most of the major towns. Both the national side and the club sides have profited from this new-found stability. After not qualifying for the final tournament of the Cup of Nations until 1976, Nigeria have since reached the final on five occasions, winning twice, in 1980 on home territory and in 1994 in Tunisia, having just qualified for the World Cup in the USA.

The most famous Nigerian footballer in the 1950s was Tesilimi Balogun and he did much to spread the gospel of the game. The late 1970s provided Nigeria with its first generation of great players including the likes of Segun Odegbami, Muda Lawal and Christian Chukwu, but it was the 1990s which first saw players become really well known outside Nigeria. Stephen Keshi, Rashidi Yekini, Daniel Amokachi, Emmnuel Amunike, Finidi George and Augustine Okacha have all made a big impact with European clubs. In America the Nigerians were just two minutes away from the World Cup quarter-finals and are favourites to be the first African team to lift the trophy.

The other successful West African nations were all French colonies and they include Guinea, the Ivory Coast - or Côte d'Ivoire as they prefer to be called - and Senegal. Guinea, though very strong in the 1970s at both club and national level, have faded alarmingly. At the height of their power they possessed the best team Africa had seen: Petit Sory, Papa Camara, Bangaly Sylla, Cherif Soulayeman, N'Jolea, Tollo and Jansky will not be forgotten in a hurry, but they have not been replaced by players of equal quality.

The Ivory Coast have inherited their mantle as the top Francophile nation in the region. Blessed with a sound club structure based around the Abidjan quartet of ASEC, Africa Sports, Stella and Stade Abidjan, they have a healthy if not startling record. Until their victory in the 1992 Cup of Nations, they were often likened to Yugoslavia; always there displaying great skill, but never quite consistent enough to actually win titles. Though the league in the Ivory Coast is one of the most stable on the continent, French club football has been a great temptation for many of their top footballers, such as Youssouf Fofana and Abdoulaye Traoré in recent years and Laurent Pokou in the past. The league has been dominated by Abidjan clubs, but teams like SC Ganoa, Reveil Doloa and ASC Bouaké are starting to make more of an impact.

Senegal are not as strong as the other four West African powers, never having won a title at club or national level. The country does produce good footballers such as Francoise Bocande and Souleyman Sane, the majority of whom end up in France, and it is from this base that the national team is built. The 1992 Cup of Nations was a good pointer as to how far they have still to go: on home territory, they could do no better than the quarter-finals.

One or two of the region's other nations have made their presence felt now and again. Mali reached the final of the All-Africa Games in 1965, a year after Stade Malien had reached the final of the initial African Cup of Champion Clubs, whilst two years later Real Bamoko lost to Stade Abidjan in the second Champions Cup. Since 1972, when the national side were runners-up to Congo in the Cup of Nations, their only performance of note has been reaching the semi-finals in 1994. The other nation to have made its mark briefly is Togo. In 1968 Etoile Filante lost in the final of the Champions Cup to TP Englebert and in 1983 Agaza Lomé reached the final of the Cup Winners Cup before losing to Al Mokaouloum.

There are four regional tournaments. At club level the West African Club Championship is disputed between the runners-up of the national leagues of the region, not the champions. For the national sides, the CEDEAO tournament, named after the economic trade grouping, was supposed to be a regional championship but there has never been much enthusiasm for it, nor for the Zone 3 tournament for which Ghana, Nigeria, Benin, Burkina Faso (formerly Upper Volta), Côte d'Ivoire, Liberia, Niger and Togo qualify. Only the Zone 2 tournament has proved popular, and mostly because of the intense rivalry between Senegal and Guinea. Other nations entitled to take part are Cape Verde, Gambia, Guinea-Bissau, Mali, Mauritania and Sierra Leone. Along with the WAFU Club Cup it is the only tournament currently played.

EAST AFRICA

East Africa produces some of the finest athletes in the world and was the main area of British control during the first half of the century, so it is surprising that in football terms it should be the weakest of all the regions in Africa. Perhaps one factor in this lack of success is the importance of its regional tournaments, which are often more keenly contested than the continental cups. Another is the lack of experience of football outside the region; very few players from Burundi, Ethiopia, Kenya, Rwanda, Somalia, the Sudan, Tanzania or Uganda, the nations which make up East Africa, ever ply their trade elsewhere. Though this benefits the local leagues in that there is no player-drain, it does mean that new ideas and tactics are missing.

Ethiopia and Sudan were among the early shakers and movers in African football but have both seen their role steadily diminish over the years, due in no small part to the disastrous effects of famine and civil war that have plagued both countries. Both have won the Cup of Nations, Ethiopia in 1962 when it was held in Addis Ababa, and Sudan in 1970 when Khartoum hosted the event for the second time. They were founder members of CAF along with Egypt and South Africa; Sudan has had a football association since 1936, Ethiopia since 1943.

In the period of occupation by Italy from 1936-41, Ethiopia had a 'Sports Office for the Indigenous' which strictly forbade any inter-racial matches and designated certain sports fields as out of bounds for the locals. It was as well for Ethiopian football, therefore, that Italian rule was brief; it was not a helpful attitude for the world champions of the time to take, when they were in an excellent position to assist in the spread of the game. Club football has never been strong in Ethiopia, but in Sudan two clubs, Al Hilal and Al Merreikh, stand well above the rest and both have known success in the African club competitions. Against all the odds, Sudanese football found its feet again in the late 1980s as Merreikh won the Cup Winners Cup in 1989, following on from Hilal's Champions Cup final appearance of two years earlier.

Kenya, Uganda and Tanzania have a long football rivalry dating back to the 1920s in the form of the Gossage Cup, a tournament named after a Governor of the time and played by representative sides of each country. In the 1970s it took on a new form as the East and Central African Challenge Cup, and the entry has expanded over the years to include Malawi, Zambia, Zimbabwe, Sudan, Ethiopia and Somalia, although the first three have recently withdrawn. Uganda's football association dates back to 1924, Kenya's to 1932 and Tanzania's to 1930. Zanzibar, which remained an independent nation from Tanzania until 1964, still fields a side in the East and Central African Challenge Cup. Neither the national nor the club sides from these three nations have been very successful. There is an intense rivalry in Kenya between Gor Mahia and AFC Leopards (formerly Abaluhya), and the former remain Kenya's only African title holders after winning the Cup Winners Cup in 1987. Simba FC from Uganda managed to reach the Champions Cup final in 1972, as did their compatriots Nakivubo Villa in 1991, but such achievements are few. In the Cup of Nations, the story is no different. Uganda's appearance in the 1978 final, in which they lost to Ghana in Accra, marks the only significant impact the three countries have made on the tournament. Tanzania is the weakest of the trio, having made the finals on only one occasion.

The other two nations, Burundi and Rwanda, are keen competitors but little more. Both are among the most remote countries in the world and this will always hold them back, as will the bloody conflict which erupted there in 1994. In the region as a whole, however, there is tremendous potential for football. It is a popular sport and there are many fine athletes about. Perhaps for once a strong case could be made for encouraging players to play in Europe. The experience could be the impetus the area needs to start challenging the rest of Africa for honours.

CENTRAL AFRICA

Central Africa is made up of eight countries, though in the Central African games Angola, Burundi and Rwanda, not classified in the region by CAF, are also invited to take part. The big three are Cameroon, Congo and Zaire, though the latter two have seen their influence decline in recent years. In Cameroon, the region has the most famous of all Africa's teams. In the 1990 World Cup they were ten minutes away from reaching the semi-finals before two penalties given away carelessly let England off the hook in what was undoubtedly the best match of the tournament. That performance earned Africa a third slot in the 1994 finals. Cameroon had already impressed in the 1982 World Cup in Spain when Italy, the eventual winners, qualified for the second round at their expense only by virtue of having scored more goals. Cameroon's star player in both tournaments was Roger Milla.

A relatively late developer in football, Cameroon was the only country under French rule which was not affiliated to the French Football Federation, and the situation was made even more complicated by the division of the country into British and French Protectorates. This was only resolved in 1961 when the northern part of the British-controlled territory voted to join Nigeria and the south Cameroon. Oryx Douala, one of the famous pre-independence clubs, were quick to take up the challenge of the new African Cup of Champion Clubs, and they hold a special place in African football folklore as its first winners. Since then, however, other clubs from Yaounde and Douala have emerged, most notably Canon and Tonnerre from the former and Union from the latter. These three have dominated both the league and cup since the 1970s.

In African club competitions in the seventies Canon, Tonnerre and Union were unstoppable, winning eight titles and appearing in a further three finals. Since Union's win in the 1981 Cup Winners Cup, however, the titles have dried up and the focus has switched to the national side as the Indomitable Lions, as they are known, have swept all before them. On three consecutive occasions from 1984-88 they appeared in the final of the Cup of Nations, and were only denied a trio of titles when Egypt won the 1986 competition on penalties.

Although Milla has stolen much of the limelight with his displays for the national team, especially in the 1990 World Cup, Cameroon have been represented by many fine players. Thomas N'Kono and Antoine Bell are two of the most celebrated goalkeepers not only in Africa but also in Europe, the destination of most of the top Cameroon players. Players like Emmanuel Kunde, Paul M'Fede, Cyril Makanaky and Emile M'Bouh have all helped put Cameroon on the map. Such is their reputation now that despite a relatively small population, it will take some knocking to get them off the perch on which they currently stand, even if performances since 1990 have not been quite so impressive, with matters not helped by a series of bitter disputes within the federation.

Zaire is the biggest country of the region both in terms of population and size, so it was no surprise when they became the first black African country to reach the World Cup finals in 1974. Humiliated by a 9-0 defeat against Yugoslavia, they have suffered deeply since that outing and have only recently emerged from the shadows again. Yet football has a long history in the country. Zaire was Belgium's largest colony and under their guidance the Association Royale Sportive Congolaise was founded in Leopoldville (later Kinshasa) in 1919, making it the second oldest association on the continent after South Africa. There was a thriving league, started three years earlier, confined at first to Leopoldville. A league was also started in Elizabethville (later Lumbumbashi) but for many years the main focus was the Pool Championship. Stanley Pool, the lake which separated the Belgian Congo from the French Congo and its capital Brazzaville, gave its name to a championship played between sides from the two countries which lasted from 1923 until independence.

From the late 1960s until 1974, Zaire was the most powerful country in Africa. Twice winners of the Cup of Nations, their main clubs, AS Vita from Kinshasa and TP Englebert from Lubumbashi, also collected three continental club honours between them. Although TP Mazembe, as Englebert are now known, won the Cup Winners Cup in 1980 and Daring Club Motema Pembe did so in 1994, teams from Zaire have not been as predominant as they were before. The contrast is even more marked for the national side. Since winning the Cup of Nations in 1974 they have only managed to qualify for the final tournament on four occasions since.

The French Congo, known for a while as Congo Brazzaville but now simply as Congo, have suffered much the same fate. As winners of the 1972 Cup of Nations thanks in no small measure to Francois M'Pele, Congo's most famous player, and of the Champions Cup in 1974 with CARA Brazzaville, the country's most famous club, the future looked rosy. Since then, however, very little of substance has been achieved. With a population of only two million it is perhaps not surprising that this should be the case. One would expect a country like Gabon, with a similar population but vast oil resources, to be in a much better position to succeed, and in the UDEAC tournament this has indeed been the case. Of the remaining countries, the Central African Republic has been too racked with poverty to pay much attention to football, whilst the football authorities in Chad do not take too kindly to paying their dues to FIFA or CAF and have spent many years in the wilderness.

SOUTHERN AFRICA

Few doubt that southern Africa could well become one of the growth regions of world football. Now that apartheid has all but crumbled away in South Africa, more and more attention will be focused on the region, which has for many years been a backwater of the game. South Africa may have been a founder member of CAF but it has never played a part in African football, only recently has its northern neighbour Zimbabwe been able to join in, both Angola and Mozambique have been fighting fierce civil wars, and as a puppet state of the South Africans Namibia was also an international outcast until its independence in 1990.

The rump of active football nations left consisted of Zambia, Malawi, Botswana, Lesotho, Swaziland, Madagascar, the Comores Islands and Mauritius, hardly a task force to take on the world. In the new order that is likely to emerge, South Africa, Zimbabwe, Zambia, Angola and Mozambique look set to be the strongest. Most attention will unavoidably fall on South Africa. As a nation the South Africans have a sporting history to match even the best in the world. Before their international exile because of apartheid, their rugby and cricket teams were world-beaters. The Springboks, as the rugby side is called, were especially feared, but like everything in South Africa rugby was run along racial lines and remained a sport that was largely a preserve of the white minority population. The exciting aspect about the future of South African football will be that for the first time the black majority will be able to make their mark on international sport, for it is football, not rugby or cricket, that is the passion of the people, a factor commonly ignored by supporters of the other sports.

Football did not escape the horrors of apartheid and its roots are deeply entrenched in the country's colonial past. In 1882 the British province of Natal founded an association for the game, three years after South Africa's first club, Pietermaritzburg County, was formed. Along with the association in New South Wales in Australia, this body was the first of its kind outside Britain. Cape Province, the other British territory, soon followed suit and in 1892 the two were the prime movers behind the new Football Association of South Africa, the oldest national body in Africa.

The Dutch areas of Transvaal and Orange Free State quickly took to the game as well. In 1892 the Currie Cup was introduced for representative teams of the four provinces; it has been dominated by Transvaal and Natal. In 1959 professionalism was introduced and the National Professional Football League (NPFL) started. Until this point there had been a variety of local leagues and tournaments, but the NPFL, later known simply as the NFL, was the first to be open to the whole country, although at first only clubs from Johannesburg and Pretoria were represented. An all-white league from the start, the NFL suffered greatly when in 1972 the non-white National Professional Soccer League was founded. It was an instant hit among the black population. Faced with this stiff competition, the NFL agreed to merge with the NPSL in 1978 and later became known as the National Soccer League.

From that time, on the playing field at least, football was one of the few racially-integrated activities in the country. There have been problems of who actually controls the game, but in January 1992 the CAF were sufficiently confident that a single governing body was in place that they welcomed South Africa back into the fold. The following June the South Africans celebrated their return with three matches against Cameroon, thereby ending almost 30 years of international exile.

For many years Zimbabwe was in a similar position to South Africa. As Rhodesia, and before that as Southern Rhodesia, they too became outcasts as a result of the racial policies of their government. Rhodesia became an independent country after UDI in 1965 and immediately joined FIFA, but CAF would have nothing to do with them until the advent of black majority rule in 1980. After a brief flirtation with the World Cup in 1970, the Rhodesians were suspended from FIFA and did not take part again until 1982, as Zimbabwe, but their form since has not been particularly impressive either at international or club level. They have yet to qualify for the Cup of Nations, while the club sides have found it impossible to progress beyond the quarter-finals of the African championships.

Zimbabwe's neighbours Zambia, known before independence as Northern Rhodesia, have fared better and in 1991 took their first continental honour when Power Dynamos won the Cup Winners Cup. The Northern Rhodesia Football Association was formed in 1929 and affiliated to the Nyasaland Football Association in present-day Malawi. After independence in 1964, the Zambians lacked any neighbours to the south to play against and so concentrated their efforts on the tournaments played by the East and Central confederation. In 1974 they lost to Zaire in the final of the Cup of Nations and since then they have reached the semi-finals twice and the final again in 1994. In 1988 at the Seoul Olympics the Zambians caused a sensation by defeating the professional Italian side 4-0 to reach the quarter-finals before losing to West Germany. But in 1993 Zambia made world headlines when the plane carrying the national team to a World Cup qualifier crashed off the coast of Gabon, killing everyone on board including 18 players. Even then, under the leadership of Kalusha Bwalya, Zambia's most famous player, they almost made it to the finals in America and, in a remarkable rebuilding process, reached the final of the Nations Cup in Tunis where they lost 2-1 to Nigeria.

Zambia and later Zimbabwe's lack of nearby quality opposition was not helped by the unstable situations in many of the neighbouring countries. Mozambique may have produced two of the greatest ever footballers in Eusebio and Mario Coluña, but since the Portuguese upped and left Mozambique and Angola in 1975, both countries have produced nothing but bloody conflict. Namibia, another neighbour, had been involved in yet another South African-sponsored civil war, although since independence in 1990 Namibians have taken part in African football for the first time.

None of the other nations of the region have contributed much to the game. The vast, under-populated Botswana, the tiny kingdoms of Lesotho and Swaziland, Mauritius and Madagascar are all keen competitors but have achieved little of note. Only Malawi, in the East and Central African competitions, make their presence felt occasionally. The region may not have much of a history, but it is a time of change and only Angola still remains at war. It is possible that a regional championship of sorts could emerge to help get all of the countries on their feet, but in the future southern Africans will have their eyes very much on the African and world titles at stake; who would bet against South Africa being the first African country to host the World Cup?

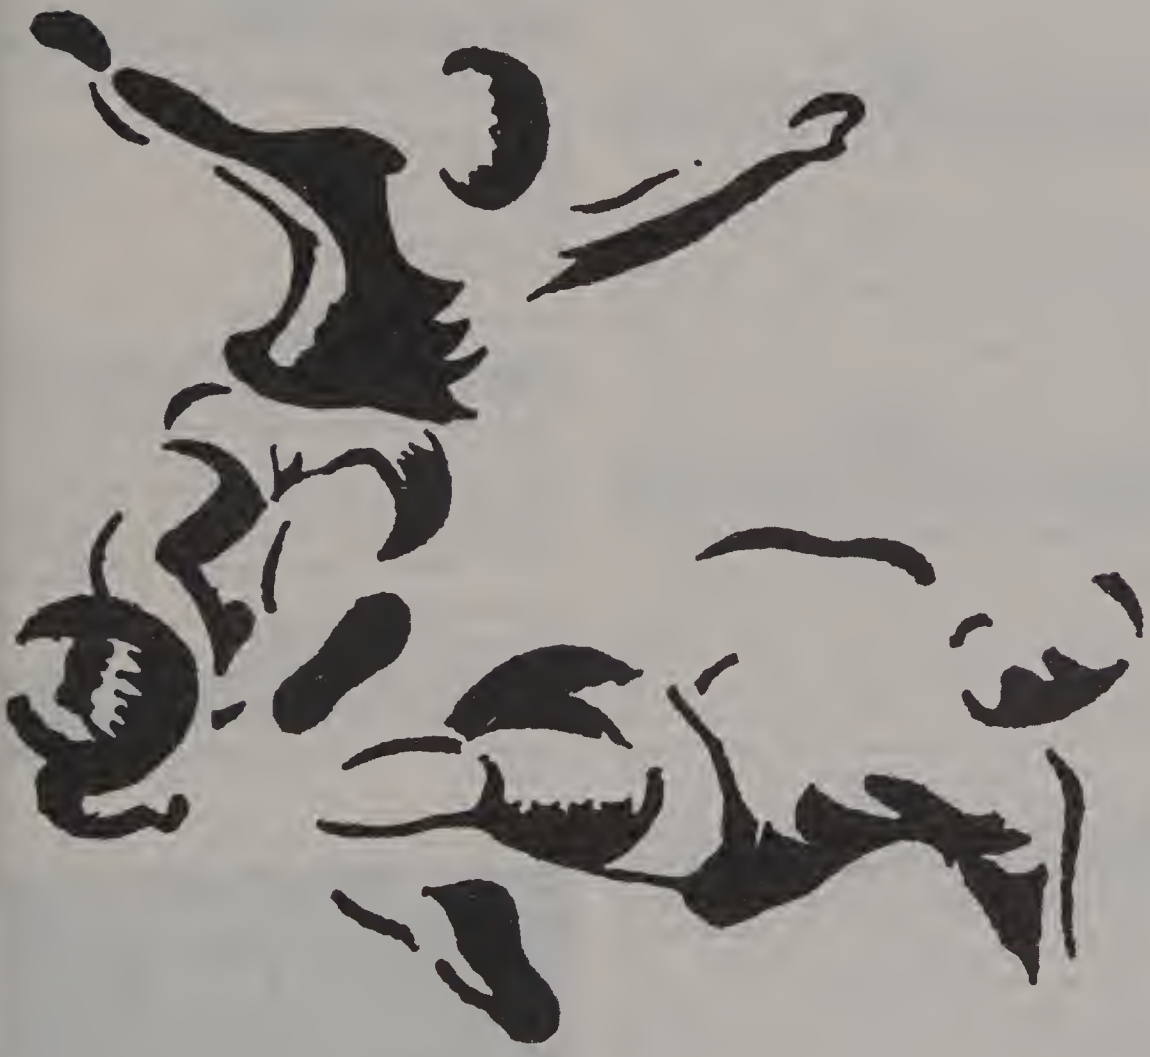
CONCACAF



WORLD SOCCER

The Confederación Norte-Centroamericana y del Caribe de Fútbol, or CONCACAF for short, is with the exception of Oceania the weakest of the continental confederations, and for many years seemed to exist in order that Mexico could be guaranteed a place at the World Cup. The present body dates only from 1961; before that there had been a confusion of bodies claiming responsibility over the game in the region, or various parts of it. Part of the problem is that CONCACAF is not a recognisable geographical entity. By rights there should be a confederation for all the countries of the Americas, as existed in the 1950s, but this body never had any jurisdictional power as the South American confederation was unwilling to see its own control weakened. Nowadays the countries that make up CONCACAF would similarly be unwilling to relinquish their three automatic World Cup berths.

In 1924 the Congreso Deportivo Centroamericano was founded and this became the Organizacion Deportiva Centroamericano y del Caribe. Its primary function was to organise the Central American and Caribbean Games which started in 1930, and in which there was a football tournament. Before the 1938 edition of those Games it was decided to found a football-only governing body and so the Confederación Centroamericana y del Caribe de Fútbol, or the CCCF, came into being. Its charter members included Colombia and Venezuela from South America, most of the Central American nations, as well as Haiti, Puerto Rico and Jamaica from the Caribbean. It organised a new tournament, the Championship of the CCCF, which was open to amateurs and professionals.

In 1939 a short-lived North American Football Confederation, containing the United States, Cuba and Mexico, was founded and two championships played, but by 1961 the Mexicans in particular were keen to revitalise the international game in the region, which the CCCF had never really got to grips with, and that year they became one of the founding members of CONCACAF along with Cuba, Guatemala, Honduras and the Netherland Antilles. Other members soon followed and by 1970 there were 14 in all. Since then the number has risen to 30 as the tiny islands of the Caribbean have made the effort to join. CONCACAF's major role has been to organise championships both for the clubs and the national sides, but two concerns have always dominated its activities.

First, Mexico is by far and away the strongest of all the nations affiliated. When their sides take the club championship seriously, teams from other nations do not really stand a chance. Even worse for CONCACAF has been Mexico's total indifference to the championship for national sides, so much so that it was abandoned as a separate event in the 1970s and the winners of the World Cup qualifying competition were regarded as champions. The other problem has been the attitude of the United States, whose national and club sides have shunned both CONCACAF competitions. The New York Cosmos et al had more important matters on their mind than playing in some backwater tournament, or so it seemed.

CONCACAF could, however, be one of the growth regions of the future because finally the United States is beginning to take football seriously, spurred by its hosting of the 1994 World Cup. In 1992 CONCACAF moved their offices from Guatemala City to New York in a bid to attract more finance, whilst the previous year they had launched the CONCACAF Gold Cup, the first edition of which contained, for the first time, the majority of countries in the region, including all the big names. The club competition is also undergoing a transformation, albeit more slowly, and recently it became the American Airlines Cup. Although Costa Rican sides won in 1993 and 1994, generally Mexican clubs still dominate.

CONCACAF GOLD CUP

Perhaps the most significant development in CONCACAF in recent years has been the rekindled interest in the United States' national side. In an effort to boost the level of competition in the region, America was a major backer for the CONCACAF Gold Cup introduced in 1991. A separate CONCACAF championship had not been held since the 1971 tournament in Trinidad, won by Mexico.

The aim of the Gold Cup was to rekindle that idea and exploit the growing interest in the game. In 1991 Costa Rica won the first Central American UNCAF Cup and qualified with Honduras and Guatemala for the first Gold Cup finals later that year. They were joined by Jamaica and Trinidad, winners and runners-up of the 1991 Shell Caribbean Cup, and the three North American countries, Canada, the USA and Mexico. The tournament, played in America, gave the hosts their first international honour at senior level when they beat Honduras on penalties after a goalless final in Los Angeles.

Two years later the organisers decided to stage the tournament jointly in Mexico and America. It was no surprise that both 'home' teams reached the final, which was held this time in Mexico City. The Mexicans, who had been beaten by the USA in the semi-finals in 1991, gained revenge with a 4-0 win and were in scintillating form throughout the tournament, scoring 28 goals in five games with Canada, Martinique and Jamaica bearing the brunt.

CONCACAF CLUB TOURNAMENTS

Although the overall standard of its club football lags behind Europe, South America and Africa, the CONCACAF region does contain one of the world's strongest leagues: in Mexico, club football has a huge following and generates large amounts of revenue, some of which is used to entice players from all over South America to play in the Mexican league. It is not unknown for the 110,000-capacity Azteca stadium to sell out for big games, and large crowds are common in most of the major cities. It is a standard which the Central American and Caribbean countries cannot hope to match, so when Mexican clubs take the CONCACAF Champion Clubs Cup seriously it is something of an unequal struggle.

The first tournament kicked off on 25 March 1962 with five Central American countries represented and two from the Caribbean. Mexico made the total entry eight and Guadalajara duly emerged as the first champions, beating Comunicaciones of Guatemala in a two-legged final just under five months later. After this promising start the tournament then fell prey to lack of interest, logistical problems and disputes. The entry for 1963 rose by one to nine and Racing Club of Haiti qualified to meet Guadalajara in the final, but a trip to the Caribbean did not seem a worthwhile undertaking and the holders pulled out, leaving Racing as unlikely champions. It was to be the first of many unplayed final ties.

The next two tournaments did not even get that far, both being abandoned in the early stages, and delays built up to such an extent that the 1966 event did not get started at all. On 6 August 1967 the sixth tournament got underway with eight clubs but crucially no Mexican entry, leaving the way free for El Salvador's Alianza to beat Jong Colombia from the Netherlands Antilles in a three-legged final played in March 1968.

It has usually been the practice to divide the entrants into zones, of North America, Central America and the Caribbean. In 1968 Toluca won the North zone, Aurora the Central and Transvaal the Caribbean, but CONCACAF expelled the latter two sides leaving Toluca as champions in yet another controversy-dogged event. There were no such problems the following year but in 1970 the three regional winners again did not contest the final when Deportivo Saprissa and Transvaal withdrew. Cruz Azul were declared champions, their second successive triumph, and in 1971 they made it three in a row when they beat Liga Deportiva Alajuelense 5-1 in Mexico City: both clubs had finished level on points in a six-team final tournament in Guatemala.

The number of entries for that edition had been a record 18 and the tournament's prospects had never looked better, but for the rest of the decade the Mexican clubs lost interest and, perhaps more damagingly, none of the NASL clubs from North America ever entered. The event became something of a sideshow in which the likes of Transvaal, Municipal and Aguila could flourish. Mexican support for the tournament has been sporadic since, although more consistent from the early 1980s. América, in particular, have always found a place for it in their fixture list, and with four victories are the most successful side in the history of the event, followed by Cruz Azul and UNAM with three apiece. In recent years new sponsorship has brought fresh hope and a Cup Winners Cup has been introduced. Mexico, the only country with a strong, established domestic cup competition, not surprisingly won two of the first three editions.

CANADA

Curiously, Canada's football headquarters can be found in James Naismith Drive, a street named after the inventor of basketball, which neatly symbolises the way the indigenous North American sports have overshadowed football. Only once have Canada made a mark in football and that was when they qualified for the finals of the World Cup in 1986. Football is not high on the Canadian list of priorities. Ice hockey is the national pastime, a distinctive brand of gridiron called Canadian football is played, and Canadian baseball teams take part in North America's Major League. Following the pattern of baseball and ice hockey in which the United States and Canada share the same league, Canadian soccer teams took part in the great NASL experiment of the 1970s through the Vancouver Whitecaps, Olympique de Montreal, Edmonton Drillers and Toronto Metros, and in the process won two Soccer Bowl finals.

A club called Montreal Football Club was founded in 1868 and in these early years the Association code was played in a number of universities in the country. McGill University in Montreal, however, were ultimately to determine the destiny of the game and unfortunately for football they favoured rugby. In a famous match with Harvard University in 1874, McGill won over their American counterparts to the oval ball code and the North American continent has not looked back since. The game eventually developed into the present-day American and Canadian gridiron football, and soccer, as it is known there, has not stood a chance.

The Association code did not die altogether and in 1886 a team representing Canada travelled to Newark to play the United States in a challenge match, a journey they repeated the following year. Though some have doubted the validity of the matches as full internationals, they do represent a landmark in world football history. If treated as full internationals they are the first such games to be played anywhere outside the British Isles. In 1888 a Canadian team travelled to Scotland, while three years later another made the same journey and played games against representative sides from England, Scotland and Wales, in what marked the first visit to Britain by a foreign team. In 1904 Galt Football Club from Ontario, a major centre of football at the time, played the United States in the St Louis Olympic Games. Although football was only an exhibition sport, the Canadian side beat two representative sides from America to win the title and this remains the country's only honour to date.

In 1912 the Dominion of Canada Football Association was formed, the predecessor of the current Canadian Soccer Association. They introduced a cup competition for the champion team of each province and a trophy was donated by the Duke of Connaught. Until the late 1980s this remained the only national tournament for clubs in the country. Though football had made encouraging progress, it continued to fall behind the indigenous sports in popularity. A tour was made to Australia in 1924 and a second to New Zealand three years later but this was the only international activity until 1957, apart from three games against the United States in between the two tours. Various provinces attempted to introduce professionalism at one time or another during this period, aided by the European immigrant communities that were swelling the population of Canada, but none was lastingly successful. Due to the enormous size of the country there was no cohesive structure to the game, and it was only played with any great enthusiasm in British Colombia, Ontario and Quebec.

A national eleven was put together to enter the 1958 World Cup and in June 1957 Canada eventually played their first game on home soil with a 5-1 victory over the United States. Though the Americans were beaten in both qualifying matches, Mexico won twice in Mexico City to end Canada's first venture into the World Cup. The 1960s saw a reappraisal of the game in Canada. In 1961 the Eastern Canada Professional Soccer League was formed and this lasted until 1966. The following year Canadian clubs joined the fledgling North American Soccer League, and until 1984 when the NASL collapsed, football in Canada was represented by teams from Montreal, Toronto, Edmonton and Vancouver at various times, the highlights being the victories in the Soccer Bowl by the Toronto Metros in 1976 and the Vancouver Whitecaps in 1979, both coming when the NASL was at its peak. The demise of the NASL was a serious blow to football in the country.

The World Cup qualification in 1986 may well be seen as a knock-on effect from the 18 years of professional football, as the majority of the team had played for NASL clubs. The fact that Mexico, the hosts, qualified automatically for the finals undoubtedly had much to do with Canada's achievement, but they still managed to see off Costa Rica and Honduras in the final qualifying round. The Canadians failed to score in the finals but were by no means disgraced, suffering only narrow defeats against France, the Soviet Union and Hungary.

Success has otherwise not been easy to come by. Even when the Olympic Games were held in Montreal in 1976 the national side could not get past the North Koreans in the first round, and since 1986, despite the introduction of the Canadian Soccer League in 1987, the national side have struggled to make an impact. In the 1991 North American Championship they placed a poor third behind Mexico and the United States, and could not get past the first round of the CONCACAF Gold Cup in Los Angeles later in the year. In 1993 they even suffered an 8-0 thrashing at the hands of Mexico.

MEXICO

Unfortunately for Mexican football, the country is situated in a footballing no-man's land. To the north is the largely uninterested United States, to the south the small states of Central America and to the east the islands of the Caribbean. With a strong tradition in football that has seen it stage two World Cups, Mexico appears out on a limb, never maximising the potential that undoubtedly exists there.

Football came to Mexico at the end of the 19th century and in particular to Mexico City, already at that time one of the world's largest cities. (Now, with its population conservatively estimated at 14 million, it is the largest.) It was not long before a league was founded and in 1903 Mexico saw its first championship played. Based as it was in the capital, it remained the domain of clubs from Mexico City until the 1940s.

The most famous of these clubs were España, Reforma and América. España were the most successful and they remain the leading championship winners with 14 titles despite the fact that none of them have come after 1945. They and Reforma flourished in an age of amateurism, but like South America, Mexico was not exempt from the rise of professionalism and the organisational squabbles that went with it. In 1927, some 24 years after the league had started and primarily to organise a national team and gain recognition from FIFA, the Federación Mexicana de Fútbol Asociación was formed. It immediately ran into trouble over professionalism and in 1931 was replaced by another governing body which was prepared to sanction payment.

The composition of the league has changed greatly since its introduction as clubs from the other large cities have entered the fray, most notably from Guadalajara, but also from Monterrey, Puebla, Leon and the small city of Toluca. Mexico has over a million registered players, one of the largest figures in the world, so its club base is very strong. Clubs like Leon and Deportivo Guadalajara tapped into these resources and built teams capable of taking on those from the capital. Leon's triumph in 1948 marked a watershed in Mexican club football and was followed by the complete domination of the late 1950s and 1960s by Deportivo Guadalajara. Although América remain a powerful force in the capital, Cruz Azul and UNAM, formed after the introduction of professionalism, have joined them as the major focus of attention.

In one concession to their northern neighbours, the Mexican league, after being run on a straight league basis for many years, has adopted the system so favoured of the major American sports. Four divisions of five teams, the members of which play all the teams from the other leagues, qualify two teams each for the end of season play-offs, ending with a grand final. It is a system that seems to work and is popular with the fans, and compared to some of the complicated systems used in the South American countries it has a lot to recommend it.

The formation of the federation in 1927 saw the national side take the field for the first time in the 1928 Olympic Games, but Mexico's Olympic adventure lasted just one game as Spain, their first opponents, defeated them heavily. So as not to return home after just one game, the side entered the consolation tournament, but here too they were handed a first round defeat, this time at the hands of Chile. Two years later Mexico entered the first World Cup in Montevideo, and over the years the tournament has been the focus of their fixture list, given the lack of competitive games elsewhere. Ten appearances in the finals certainly shows the strength of Mexico vis-a-vis their Central American neighbours, but their performances once there give a fairer indication of their world status: not until 1962 did they manage to win a game. Taking part in five successive tournaments at this time was Antonio Carbajal, one of Mexico's most celebrated players. The famous goalkeeper played in every World Cup from 1950 to 1966, a feat not yet equalled.

It is easy to decry Mexico's record in the World Cup finals - five of their seven victories have come in their 'home' tournaments - but in friendly matches against European and South American touring sides, or whilst on tour themselves, victories have been scored against all of the top nations. Prior to the late 1960s, apart from the World Cup, international games were organised on a very haphazard basis. The Mexicans threw a lot of support behind the Panamerican Confederation in the 1950s as it sought to end its isolation, but the organisation faded away in the early 1960s and Mexico has had to be content with being a part of CONCACAF.

Many believe Mexico's future lies with CONMEBOL and in the past there have been attempts to join, which have always been blocked on geographical grounds, although since 1993 they have been invited to take part in the South American Championships, actually reaching the final in their debut year. Mexican clubs would certainly benefit from a similar invitation to enter the Copa Libertadores; at present they take part in the CONCACAF Club Championship. Club football is not strong in CONCACAF and the Mexican league stand way above the rest of the region. It is a league which can even tempt foreigners into its ranks, most notably from Argentina and Brazil, though it is still prone to lose its best players, most notably Hugo Sanchez, the star of the 1980s Real Madrid side. Its relative isolation does keep the flow at a minimum, however.

Mexico has twice been at the centre of world football by staging the World Cup in 1970 and 1986, both of which proved to be excellent tournaments. Indeed, the 1970 edition is often regarded as the best ever staged. The country as a result has some of the finest stadia in the world, none more so than the magnificent Azteca in Mexico City. With its 110,000 capacity fitted tightly around the pitch, for spectators at least there is probably no better football arena.

Their quarter-final placings in 1970 and 1986 represent Mexico's best achievements in international football to date. The 1986 side was especially good. Led by Sanchez, they almost reached the semi-finals but lost out to West Germany on penalties. The Mexicans were not allowed to enter the 1990 World Cup as they were suspended by FIFA for fielding an over-age player in a youth tournament, but in 1994 they were back, only to go out on penalties again, this time in the second round to Bulgaria. On the strength of their victory in the 1993 Gold Cup Mexico appeared in the 1995 Intercontinental Cup and were a couple of minutes away from reaching the final before conceding a late equaliser to Denmark and then suffering the inevitable defeat in the penalty shoot-out!

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Had it not been for two games played in 1874 between Harvard University and McGill University of Montreal, football today might be the national sport in the United States. In the second of these two matches, Harvard were persuaded to use an oval ball instead of the usual round one, and immediately took to it. From that they developed the handling code, and what Harvard do, others usually follow. If the US had stuck with the Association rules, who knows, they might well have become the strongest football nation in the world, indeed it would have been surprising if they had not. Instead they have the barest rump of the game, very popular at school level, we are always reminded, but with no infrastructure for developing the talent once it has left school. Efforts have continually been made to popularise the game, most notably through the North American Soccer League in the 1970s and the 1994 World Cup, but football does not have 'Made in the USA' stamped on it and so is likely to remain on the periphery of American sporting life.

The first club in America was Oneida Football Club, which was formed in 1862 in Boston by Gerritt Smith Miller, but unfortunately no longer exists. It is interesting to note that its foundation predates any club outside England - no club in Scotland had been formed by that time. All of its members came from the substantial English community located in Boston. Prior to the Harvard-McGill games, the round ball had found favour with most of the major universities on the East coast of the country. The Princeton rules, based on the 1863 Football Association rules, were drawn up in 1873 by Yale, Colombia, Rutgers and Princeton universities, but they were superseded in 1876 when Harvard, Yale and Colombia met to form the Intercollegiate Football Association and the rugby code was adopted as the basis for the rules of the game.

Once it was no longer played in the universities, football became the pastime of the numerous ethnic communities and was often centred around the factories which sponsored the teams and provided the grounds on which they played. Despite the formation in 1884 of the American Football Association by a group of Britons, the organisation of the game on a country-wide basis was haphazard. Numerous regional associations appeared, some adhering to amateurism, others allowing semi-professionalism. Particular hotspots of the game at this time included St Louis, New York, Philadelphia, New Jersey and Fall River.

Four international games were organised in these early years, two matches against Canada in Newark in 1885 and 1886 and the two exhibition matches at the St Louis Olympic Games in 1904, also against Canada. The validity of these matches as full internationals is open to some debate, but they do represent the first games played outside the British Isles which could be considered as such. The 1904 sides were actually two separate teams from St Louis called the St Rose Kickers and the Christian Brothers College, but they went under the banner of the United States.

The American Football Association, which had affiliated to the association in London, was eventually superseded in 1913 by the rival American Amateur Football Association under the aegis of the United States Football Association, later known as the United States Soccer Federation, and it was admitted to FIFA the same year. Its first task involved the organising of the first nationwide competition for all of the clubs that were now under its control. The National Open Challenge Cup, introduced the following year, is the yardstick by which football in America can be measured until the formation of the North American Soccer League in the late 1960s. It was joined in 1924 by the National Amateur Cup and both these competitions still run today.

Football's association with ethnic communities, part of its problem in America, is clear from the list of winners of both competitions. From the New York Greek Americans to the Philadelphia Ukrainians, and the Los Angeles Armenians to the German-Hungarian Soccer Club from Brooklyn, one is left in little doubt as to the composition of the teams. This has tended to alienate Americans even further from what they already consider a foreign sport.

The 1920s also saw the first attempt by the US to establish a proper league. The American Soccer League (ASL), in many ways the forerunner of the NASL, kicked off in 1921 and lasted until 1932. In its history the 12-strong league boasted 55 European internationals from nine different countries among its ranks and in 1926 a match between the New York Giants and Indiana Flooring drew a crowd of 46,000 to the New York Polo Grounds, a record until the 1970s. Efforts were also made to enter the US team in international competitions. They took part in the 1924 and 1928 Olympic Games and in the first World Cup in 1930, beating both Belgium and Paraguay in the first round in Montevideo to qualify for the semi-finals. There they faced Argentina, who had bundled them out of the Olympics two years previously with an 11-2 thrashing, so it was no surprise when they lost 6-1. Five of the team were former Scottish professionals.

Four years later the team was represented again in the final tournament, but had the misfortune to meet the hosts Italy in the first round and lost 1-0. There then followed a 13-year hiatus. As members of the North American Confederation, two series with Mexico and Cuba were played in the late 1940s for the North American Championship, neither of which proved successful. They did, however, prepare the American side for one of the biggest upsets the world has ever seen, in the 1950 World Cup. Unlike the 1930 side, the team representing the United States in Brazil that year was made up almost entirely of American born-and-bred players. In the first match, despite leading 1-0 with only 10 minutes remaining, the team contrived to lose 3-1 against Spain, but their second match against England in Belo Horizonte is indelibly etched into history. One of their few 'foreigners', Larry Gaetjens from Haiti, scored a goal that saw the mighty English humbled. So surprising was the result to those back in England that one newspaper thought there had been a mistake in the telegram and printed the result as 10-1 rather than 0-1! Defeat against Chile in the final match meant that the team returned home after the first round, but once again the World Cup had passed the country by. Not until the late 1960s did the population of America stand up and take note of what was by then far and away the most popular sport in the world.

Talk of football in the United States and the things that first come to mind are the 1950 defeat of England, the 1994 World Cup and the NASL. For nearly 20 years the United States conducted an experiment in winning over the American public to football, and the only conclusion that could be reached at the end was that Americans simply did not like the game and probably never would. Aside from the two national cup competitions, there were numerous local leagues spread around the country, one even calling itself the ASL, which had full-time professionalism. In 1960 the International Soccer League was set up, consisting of 11 foreign teams and the New York Americans, and was won in the first year by Bangu from Brazil in the final against Kilmarnock from Scotland. Unfortunately not many teams took it seriously and in 1965 the league folded.

Two years later, however, big business began looking at football: if successful in winning over Americans, they stood to make a lot of money. The United States Soccer Federation, realising the growing interest, sanctioned the United Soccer Association as the controlling body of the new national league and in 1967 it got off the ground. Ten franchises were sold and teams imported wholesale to represent these cities. The first winners were the Los Angeles Wolves with a team composed entirely of players from Wolverhampton Wanderers in England. A rival league was also set up at the same time but in 1968 the two leagues were persuaded to merge, and at last the United States had a truly national league, which included Canada as well.

The NASL, as it was known from 1968, was modelled on those that existed in American football and baseball, from the system of franchising down to the cheerleaders. New clubs were created in an attempt to get away from the ethnic image of the game and to spread it around the country to cities like Miami, Atlanta and Kansas, to whom it was new. Although the number of Americans taking part in the league grew over the years, it was always dominated by foreigners, even if they were relatively well known. The best known of these were Pelé and Franz Beckenbauer, both of whom played for the best known and most popular of the clubs created, the New York Cosmos, backed by Warner Communications. For a while it seemed as if the experiment was working. The money was there, gates were high, especially in New York, and the level of play was to a good standard. It was not to last, however.

One by one clubs folded as the owners, disappointed by profit levels, pulled the plug on their teams, and in 1984 the NASL itself folded. The major problem was that the game had been built up on an artificial basis. Clubs will only survive and even thrive if they have a history that players, supporters and owners can identify with. None of the NASL clubs had that, and so from the very start the idea was doomed to failure. Football was simply not allowed to grow naturally, and no matter how much money was thrown at it, the conditions were not right. All the ethnic leagues still survive in the United States and as these represent the only areas where there is any tradition in the American game, perhaps the NASL should have paid more attention to them, as should administrators in the future.

FIFA, despite the failure of the NASL, still regarded the United States as unconquered virgin territory full of dollars that could make their way into its coffers, and so in a decision roundly condemned at the time, they awarded the 1994 World Cup to America, in an attempt to give the game another boost. One of the conditions of the award was that a professional league should be introduced there, but by the time the World Cup was staged this had not happened, the start date having been delayed several times. The tournament itself passed off extremely well, although whether the World Cup would have a lasting influence and enable Major League Soccer (MLS) to grab the attention of the American public was always doubtful. There is at least sufficient interest for soccer not to revert to the absolute obscurity of former years, and the USA women's team were world champions in 1991. Perhaps it is with them that the country's best hope in soccer lies.

CENTRAL AMERICA

Central America has traditionally been the stronghold of CONCACAF. Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras and El Salvador are the strongest of the seven nations, although all are very much in the shadow of Mexico. The political turmoil that has characterised the area has not helped either. Civil war has been waged in El Salvador and Nicaragua, but the most famous incident relating to football remains the Fútbol War between El Salvador and Honduras in 1969.

The countries faced each other in the semi-finals of the CONCACAF World Cup qualifying group in June 1969 and rioting followed each of the matches, particularly the second game which El Salvador won to force a play-off. Salvadorean migrant workers were at the centre of the dispute and after their team defeated the Hondurans in the play-off, the tension reached boiling point and the El Salvador armed forces invaded Honduras to protect their nationals from persecution.

Costa Rica is perhaps the best of the Central American nations so it was surprising that 1990 was the first time they had made it to the World Cup finals. During the 1940s, 50s and 60s, they won nine continental titles against one for El Salvador, Guatemala and Panama, and none for Honduras, but somehow never made it to the World Cup. Instead both Honduras and El Salvador qualified before they did, though neither matched Costa Rica's success once there. In Italy the Costa Ricans defeated both Scotland and Sweden to qualify for the second round before going down to Czechoslovakia. El Salvador, on the other hand, lost all three of their games in 1970 and 1982, the latter adventure including a 10-1 thrashing at the hands of Hungary, whilst Honduras' only final appearance in 1982 resulted in two draws, with Spain and Northern Ireland, and a loss to Yugoslavia.

Costa Rica also has a good club structure. A championship was started in 1921, before any of their rivals, in which the top clubs have been Herediano, Liga Deportivo Alajuelense and, since the war, Deportivo Saprissa. The other major clubs in the region are Alianza, Deportivo FAS and Atletico Marte from El Salvador, Comunicaciones in Guatemala and Olimpia in Honduras. Until the CONCACAF Club Championship can develop into an internationally recognised tournament in place of the rather shabby event at present, progress is likely to be limited in all of these countries. Political stability would also be a useful asset, but in an area where football has caused one war already, don't count on it.

THE CARIBBEAN

The Caribbean is the birthplace of some of the best sportsmen in the world and has a rich tradition in sporting circles. The reason? Cricket. The West Indies cricket team has for decades been the best in the world and even an island as small as Antigua has produced the finest cricketer of recent years in Vivian Richards, whilst Barbados, only marginally bigger, produced perhaps the greatest cricketer of all time, Sir Gary Sobers.

The result is that football is almost non-existent as a sport, especially in the islands that were former British colonies. Jamaica, Barbados, Antigua, Guyana and Trinidad are all major Test cricket locations and so the base is just not there to support anything like a proper football structure capable of making an impact. Cricket is not the only distraction. American influence in the area is marked and so it is not surprising to learn that sports such as baseball are popular in Cuba and Puerto Rico, while other sports such as American football are also popular with television viewers in the region as a whole.

Haiti remain the only Caribbean side to have qualified for the World Cup finals since the war, although Trinidad have come close on two occasions, in 1974 when a dubious refereeing decision cost them the game against Haiti, and in 1990 when a defeat by the United States at home in their final game saw them miss out on the trip to Italy. Cuba qualified in 1938 but did not have to play any games to get there, although they did beat Romania once in France. At national level the only other achievement of note was Haiti's victory in the 1957 championship of the CCCF, but this was in a dreadfully weak field in a tournament held in Curacao.

At club level, Transvaal from Curacao, Defence Force from Trinidad and Violette and Racing Club from Haiti have all won the CONCACAF Club Championship, but this is not symptomatic of any great strength in the respective leagues, but is more a reflection on the weakness of the tournament as a whole.

The introduction in 1989 of the Shell Caribbean Cup hopefully marked the start of a new era for football in the region. For the first time the major countries got together to play a tournament, and it has been contested annually ever since, except in 1990 when the Musilmeen insurrection in Trinidad halted proceedings. Trinidad and Jamaica have done well, but so too have Martinique, the French dominion which is not even a part of CONCACAF. With the introduction of the planned Caribbean League, football can only get stronger.

SHELL CARIBBEAN CUP

Contested by the national teams of football associations affiliated with the Caribbean Union. In odd-numbered years it also serves as a qualifying competition for the CONCACAF Gold Cup, with both finalists qualifying.

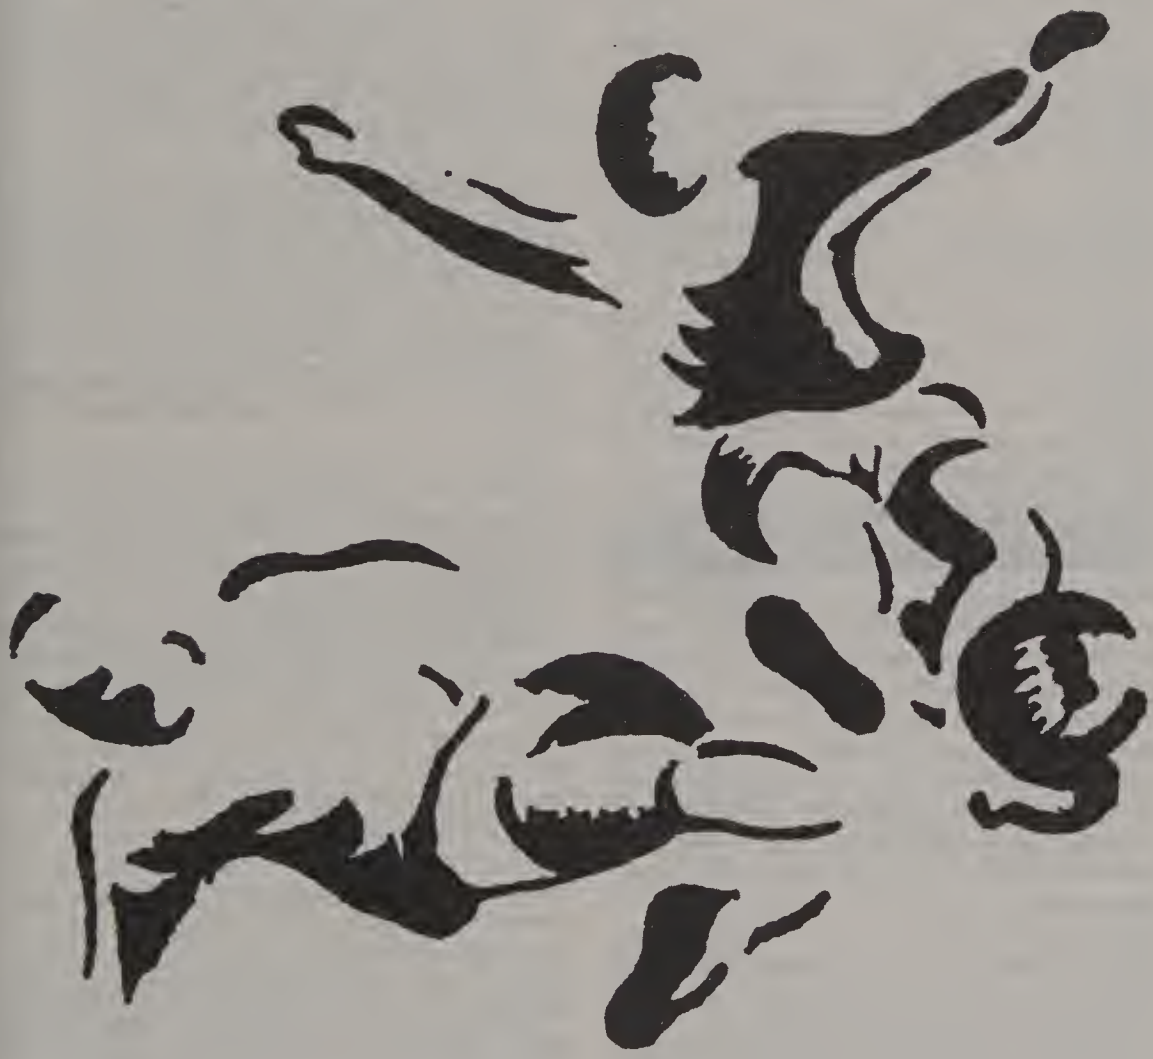
ASIA



WORLD SOCCER

Considering that Asia contains over half of the world's population, it has made a surprisingly feeble impact on football at the world level. Within Asia itself, however, the game thrives, with a multitude of tournaments and events. Some countries are more keen than others; China and India, the biggest two, who between them account for 2 billion of the world's 5 billion people, have shown little interest, whilst the Middle East, sustained by its large oil revenues, has taken to the game in a big way.

Football is largely a post-war phenomenon and has had to fight off competition from other sports. Cricket and hockey remain the passions of the Indian sub-continent, whilst American influence post-1945, especially in the Far East, has resulted in the widespread popularity of baseball, most notably in Japan, Korea, Taiwan and the Philippines.

Due to the weakness of club football in all but a few countries, the national sides are often the focus of the game, and there are plenty of tournaments to occupy their time. The two main ones are the Asian Cup, started in 1956, and the football tournament of the Asian Games, first played in 1951. There is also a vast array of non-AFC sponsored events, the most notable of which are the Merdeka Cup, organised by the FA of Malaysia since 1957, and the President's Cup, held in South Korea since 1971.

The first international match on Asian soil took place in February 1913 in Manila. As part of the Far Eastern Games, the Philippines challenged China to a match which they won 2-1. Two years later in Shanghai a second game was played, which China this time won. Japan then joined in for the third Games in Tokyo but were beaten so heavily by both China and the Philippines that they did not enter the fourth tournament. From the 1921 Games in Shanghai to the final edition in 1934, all three countries entered, but on only one occasion, in 1930 when Japan shared the title with them, did China not emerge as outright winners.

Football was played elsewhere in Asia at this time as both English and French colonists introduced the game. India, for example, has a national football federation dating from 1937, and a league in Calcutta dating from 1898, before even most Europeans had organised one. Others too had some semblance of organised football and by 1940 seventeen countries had a national football association. The game, however, remained marginalised and small-scale throughout the continent, and was mainly played by the numerous foreigners resident.

In 1951 the first real progress was made when India organised the first Asian Games. The football tournament was a big hit and at the next Games three years later the Asian Football Confederation was formed. Delegates travelling with Afghanistan, Burma, Hong Kong, India, Indonesia, Japan, the Republic of Korea, Malaysia, Pakistan, the Philippines, Singapore, Taiwan and the Republic of Vietnam put in place an organisation that was to play a key role in the development of the game on the continent.

The first task the AFC undertook was to organise a championship of their own. Unlike the football tournament of the Asian Games, the Asian Cup, as it was called, was open to both amateurs and professionals, though in reality this has never been an issue given the tiny number of professional Asian footballers. Also unlike the Asian Games, qualifying groups were organised, on a geographical basis, to produce finalists who would play in a designated country. The pattern was set for future years. With both the Asian Cup and the football tournament of the Asian Games occurring every four years, Asia in effect had a continental championship every two years.

The overall level of the game in Asia does continue to lag behind the rest of the world, however, a fact recognised by FIFA when it awarded two extra places to Africa for the 1998 World Cup but only only definite extra place to Asia. According to one commentator, the problems can be attributed to 'finance, diet, religious customs, political infighting, corruption and administrative incompetence' - but then many of these problems exist elsewhere in the world.[1]

Apart from the Asian Cup and the football tournament of the Asian Games, there are many tournaments catering for the national sides of the region. The dubious 'A' grade status given to internationals in some of these minor events has led to much debate as to the true number of 'international' matches played by Asian countries, and especially the number of caps won by some of the leading players. It is common practice for countries to play an Olympic team or an under-21 team without making this clear, and furthermore, many European opponents are listed as representing their country when in fact they are simply club sides on tour!

The Merdeka Cup is the longest running of all these tournaments. First played in 1957, for many years it was an annual event in the fixture lists of countries from south-east Asia. Held in the Malaysian capital Kuala Lumpur, and occasionally in Ipoh, as part of the country's independence celebrations, it was instrumental in the development of football in Asia as it provided an ideal, annual opportunity for courses on coaching, refereeing and so on. Its importance has been diminished since the 1980s due to the proliferation of other tournaments, and many of the contestants are no more than average European club sides. In terms of prestige it now lags behind the President's (now Korea) Cup held in South Korea. As one of the major football and economic powers in the region, Korea has been able to maintain a high standard of entry in its competition.

The late 1960s and early 1970s saw the initial burst of new tournaments following in the footsteps of the Merdeka. In 1968 the King's Cup, held annually in Thailand, was introduced, followed in 1970 by the Jakarta Anniversary Tournament. South Vietnam also held an annual competition, but the real growth occurred in the 1980s. The Jawaharal Nehru Gold Cup in India made its first appearance in 1982; in the first few years it fielded the best sides any Asian tournament has managed to assemble to date. But China, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Singapore and even Brunei and Nepal have all got in on the act, and the idea of staging international events became so devalued that in 1988 the AFC decreed that they could be staged only every two years. Unfortunately this has done little to revive a flagging concept.

In addition to all these events there are three regional competitions of some import, the Arabian Gulf Tournament, whose entrants include Bahrain, Iraq, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, and the football tournaments of the South Asian Federation Games and the South East Asian Games. The first involves Bangladesh, Bhutan, India, Maldives, Nepal, Pakistan and Sri Lanka, and is held every second year as part of a bigger tournament. The same is also true for the South East Asian Games whose participants include Brunei, Indonesia, Malaysia, Myanmar, Philippines, Singapore, Vietnam, Laos, Kampuchea and Thailand.

Economically, Asia is a growth region, and the countries on the Pacific Rim are developing into one of the world's major economic power blocs. Money is starting to filter down to the game, and in 2002 either Japan or South Korea will host the World Cup. Both now have strong professional leagues, and the growth of the game in Japan has been particularly impressive, with a host of South American and European stars appearing in the J-League. It is somewhat reminiscent of the NASL in the United States in the 1970s, but the J-League looks on much firmer ground.

Other countries look set to follow the lead set by the Japanese and the Koreans. There is huge potential for football in both China and India, whilst the addition of five ex-Soviet republics to the AFC in 1994 will inevitably strengthen the Asian game. Indeed, Uzbekistan won the 1994 Asian Games football tournament, and Neftchi Fergana, the Uzbek champions, were only a penalty shoot-out away from the 1994 Asian Champions Cup final.

The Asian Cup was introduced by the Asian Football Confederation in 1956 as a championship for its national sides. Hong Kong was awarded the staging of the first tournament, given its pioneering role in founding the AFC. The hosts were given a bye and so, effectively, were the Israelis as both Pakistan and Afghanistan refused to play them; the situation of Israel, along with that of Taiwan, would become the AFC's most pressing problem.

The finals were contested on a league basis and the six matches in the Government Stadium were very well attended by an enthusiastic Hong Kong public. The home side opened the tournament with a game against Israel which they were unlucky to lose, but Israel were generally disappointing and much more was expected of them. In the crucial game against South Korea they were 2-0 down before they started to test the Koreans, but by then it was too late.

The South Koreans have always been the strongest team in Asia along with Iran, and until the 1980 edition these two countries dominated the Asian Cup. The Koreans won the first two tournaments, the second of which was at home in 1960. The number of entrants increased from seven to eleven, but the final tournament remained in the same format until 1972. Then, as the number of entrants continued to grow, the league system was replaced with a combination of league and knock-out, and it now consists of eight teams divided into two groups of four, from which four teams qualify for the semi-finals.

The crucial game of the 1960 tournament was again the South Korea-Israel encounter. In an example of how popular the game was becoming, the match, played at Seoul's Hyochang Park Stadium, witnessed chaotic scenes. Boisterous fans broke down gates and overran the police to gain access to the stadium, which was overlooked by a hill that effectively doubled its capacity to 40,000. The Korean Prime Minister, attending the game as guest of honour, was even forced to leave during the first half because he could not see! Israel, who were still regarded as the strongest side in Asia, could not resist the Koreans who ran out 3-0 winners.

The third Asian Cup was the poorest tournament of the first three. Though played in front of big crowds in Haifa, Jerusalem, Jaffa and Ramat Gan, the standard of football was certainly not as high as it had been in Seoul four years previously. Sir Stanley Rous, attending the tournament on FIFA's behalf, also commented on the relatively poor level of sportsmanship shown by the teams. In purely practical terms, the choice of Israel as the venue was not a wise one, coming hard on the heels of the political furore at the Asian Games in Djakarta.

That the Israelis won was partly due to the fact that the defending champions, South Korea, did not send their strongest team, instead keeping it at home for an Olympic qualifying match against South Vietnam in Seoul. The decisive game of the tournament was played early on between India and Israel, but if the Koreans had beaten Israel by three clear goals in the final match before 40,000 spectators in Ramat Gan, they would have won the title for the third time in succession. Instead, Israel won 2-1 to take the title and the Koreans had to settle for third place.

The 1960s saw the rise of Iran, who succeeded in achieving what the South Koreans had failed to do as they won three Asian Cups in a row, in 1968, 1972 and 1976. In addition to this, the Iranians appeared in the final of the 1966 Asian Games and won the gold medal in 1974. To crown over a decade of success they made the journey to Argentina for the 1978 World Cup, before the fall of the Shah the following year brought to a temporary end their period of dominance. Their Asian Cup success was remarkable in that from 1968 to 1976 they won every single match they played in the competition. Even since then their record has been good, and in the three tournaments played they have reached the semi-finals on each occasion. In the late 1960s Burma (now Myanmar) were on the verge of challenging the supremacy of Iran and Korea, winning the Asian Games twice and finishing runners-up to Iran in the 1968 Asian Cup. However, the military regime then clamped down on contacts with the outside world, and the country has been in isolation ever since.

The 1970s saw a major shift begin to take place in the balance of power in Asia, as petro-dollars prompted the emergence of the Arab nations of the Middle East. The Gulf states were soon spending massive amounts of money on football facilities and coaches, and by the end of the decade the results were beginning to show. Kuwait reached the 1976 Asian Cup final and in 1980 they won the title. Two years later in the Asian Games, they reached their third final before losing to neighbours Iraq.

Saudi Arabia were also becoming a force and in both 1984 and 1988 they confirmed their supremacy by winning the Asian Cup. Oil revenues were the telling factor - of the five Asian countries who have qualified for the World Cup since 1982, four have been oil-rich Gulf states: Saudi, Kuwait, Iraq and the United Arab Emirates. Only South Korea, who have continued to be a strong force throughout the years, have managed to break that monopoly.

In the future, China will undoubtedly emerge as one of the strongest forces on the continent, if not the world; sheer weight of numbers indicates that this is likely to be the case. After years of isolation due to the presence of Taiwan in the AFC, the Chinese joined that body in 1974 and then FIFA in 1979. Those who expected them to make an immediate impact were disappointed. In three attempts China have failed to qualify for the World Cup, and although they have reached three semi-finals in the Asian Cup, the title still eludes them. As coaching methods become more widespread and more experience is gained, however, they are sure to pose a threat in the future.

India organised the first Asian Games and eleven nations gathered in the newly constructed New Delhi National Stadium on 4 March 1951. Six of these countries had brought teams for the football tournament, but it was no surprise that the standard of football played was not of the highest quality. With home advantage India were obvious favourites; of all the nations taking part they had the most organised football set-up. They dispatched Indonesia in the opening round and Afghanistan in the semi-final with some ease, but in the final they met Iran and were extremely lucky to win, relying on a fine defensive display and an opportunist goal by Mewalal four minutes into the second half. It is interesting to note that in these early years of Asian football, most games were played over 80 and not 90 minutes.

The second Asian Games in Manila built upon the success of the first and the football tournament doubled in size. It opened in spectacular style with a 3-3 draw in the newly built Rizal Memorial stadium between South Korea and Hong Kong, two of the strongest sides, who had unfortunately been drawn together in the first round. South Korea won the group and reached the final at their first attempt. In later years the Koreans would be a familar sight contesting the final and losing, as they did on this occasion. Taiwan won the tournament but that did not reflect the standard of the football in their country - the side consisted exclusively of players from Hong Kong, who chose to represent a team that was simply called 'China'. At that time the association in Taipei claimed responsibility for the game on mainland China, and this theoretically included Hong Kong. The Taiwan issue was to be a major focus of attention over the years in Asia, but in Manila the team, at least, were worthy winners.

In Tokyo in 1958 the Asian Games began to lose their innocence. In all the sports there was acrimony with complaints about biased refereeing or incompetent officials. Football did not escape, but despite the referees the standard of the play continued to improve. For the second successive Games Taiwan and Korea contested the final and again it was won by Taiwan, represented, as in 1954, by footballers based in Hong Kong.

The fourth Games, staged in the Indonesian capital Djakarta in 1962, were again the scene of bitter confrontations, not on the pitch this time but among the administrators. Indonesia's decision to rescind the invitations of Taiwan and Israel outraged the Indian delegation who even tried to have the name changed from the Asian Games, arguing that they were now nothing of the sort. Taiwan's absence meant that the football tournament was without the reigning champions, but still South Korea could not take advantage of their absence. After again playing the best football of the tournament, they lost their third final in a row, this time to the champions of the first tournament, India.

The situation of Taiwan and Israel continued to pose problems for the authorities and nowhere was this more evident than at the 1974 Asian Games in Tehran when Israel reached the final thanks to both North Korea and Kuwait refusing to play them in the semi-final group. As the Arab nations joined the AFC, sheer force of numbers weighed against Israel, and they and Taiwan were both expelled from the AFC in 1975. The Israelis have since wandered the world in search of a footballing home; Taiwan, on the other hand, were recently accepted back into the Asian fold.

ASIAN CLUB COMPETITIONS

League football is not strong in Asia and indeed many put the continent's poor impact on world football down to the lack of a well-founded club structure in the majority of countries. However, efforts are being made to rectify this situation through the reintroduction of the Asian Champion Teams' Cup; it is hoped that the tournament will stimulate increased awareness of club football.

First contested in the late 1960s for four editions, the tournament was resumed again in 1985 and has been held each year since. It does, however, face enormous logistical problems, the most basic being the enormous size of 'Asia'. After all, Riyadh and Seoul are as far apart as Madrid and Rio de Janeiro. A second problem is just who qualifies to take part, as some countries cannot admit to having a national league, and in some which do, representative rather than club sides take part.

That is not to decry Asian club football totally. South Korea, Japan, Bangladesh, Calcutta, Hong Kong and the majority of the Gulf states do have well established leagues that, given the right circumstances, do capture the attention of the public, but it is a hard battle, as a glance at the television screens of the continent will tell you. Wherever you look there is Italian, English, German and Spanish football being screened, but little of the local variety.

In the early editions of the competition, an Israeli club appeared in all of the four finals and won it three times. The monopoly was broken once, by the Taj club from Iran. As Israel does not take part anymore and none of the Iranian clubs of the time exist any longer, the links between the old event and the new are patchy. The victorious team in the 1991 edition, Esteghlal, are the team of the Iranian army, as were Taj, but there the similarity ends.

Japan and Saudi Arabia have been the dominant countries since the reintroduction, with three final appearances each, and their two leagues are among the strongest in Asia, as both can afford the facilities and the coaches. Others included would be South Korea, who in 1983 introduced a professional super league of teams attached to some of the country's biggest industrial concerns. It proved succesful enough for Japan to follow suit in 1992, although in Japan's case most of the franchises taken up were by clubs that already existed.

Above all the others, however, stands Hong Kong, whose league for many years was the only professional one in Asia. It not only attracted most of the best Asian players but also a good number of Europeans and South Americans, who were seeking to make some money at the end of their careers. Given that it is - just - still a colony of Great Britain, the link with players from the English and Scottish leagues has been strong.

There is a long way to go before Asian club football catches up even with that of Africa. The ultimate goal would be for the Asian champions to take part in a four way club championship of the world with the European Cup, Copa Libertadores and African Champions Cup winners - but it could be a good many years before that happens.

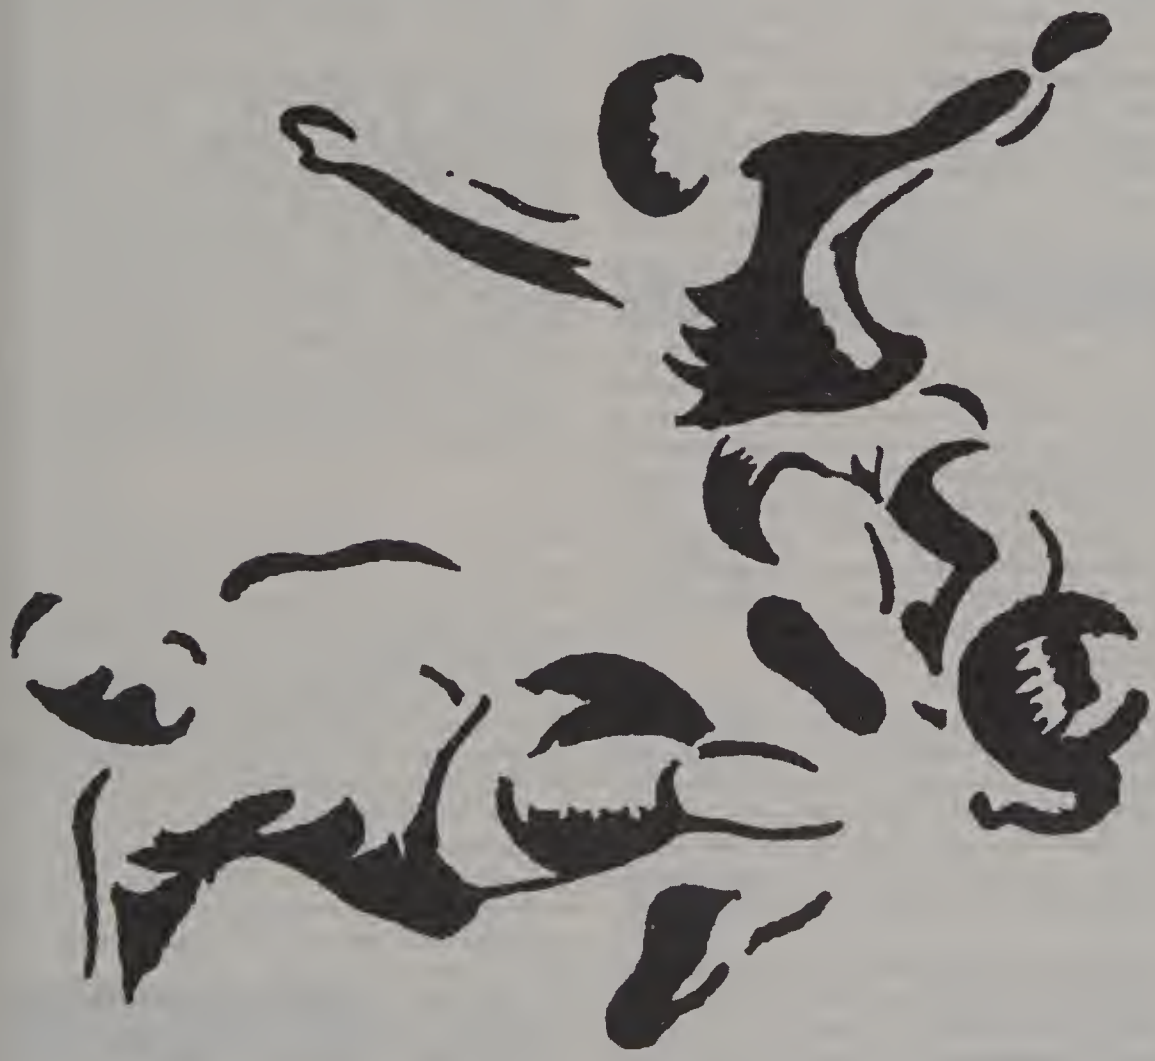
OCEANIA



WORLD SOCCER

Although the Oceania Football Confederation governs football in more than one sixth of the area of the world, it is not considered important enough by FIFA to grant it voting rights on its executive committee. The two major countries in the Oceania confederation are Australia and New Zealand, and they are joined by six of the larger nations among the many Pacific islands. The problem is that few of them can claim football to be the major sport in their respective countries.

New Zealand won the first rugby World Cup in 1987 and Australia followed them as winners four years later, but rugby is even more deeply ingrained in the culture of the rest of the region. Both Fiji and Western Samoa have reached the quarter-finals of that event, whilst Papua New Guinea, the Solomon Islands and Tonga are all regarded as strong opponents on their day. Only in the former French territories of Tahiti, New Caledonia and Vanuatu is football the main pastime, and their small populations severely limit their prospects. Not to be underestimated either is the American influence in the region which has ensured the spread of baseball and American football, especially in Guam and American Samoa.

Due to the enormous distances involved international activity is extremely restricted, even for New Zealand and Australia. An Oceania tournament has been played on two occasions, but neither was a conspicuous success and since 1980 it has not been thought worthwhile to organise a third. A similar tournament for clubs is simply out of the question. The only other regional tournament of any import is the football tournament of the South Pacific Games and this has been dominated by Tahiti and New Caledonia.

Oceania's future was put in jeopardy in the early 1970s when Australia sought affiliation with the Asian Football Confederation in an attempt to increase the level of competition, but their approaches were rejected. Instead both Australia and New Zealand have had to be content with entries into both the World Cup and Olympic Games, as well as friendly matches against touring European sides.

The World Cup is now a major feature but only Australia, Fiji and New Zealand entered before 1994, Tahiti, the Solomon Islands, Vanuatu and Western Samoa making their first appearance in the qualifiers for USA '94. Australia and New Zealand have qualified for the finals once each, but on each occasion they did so through the Asian qualifying tournament. In 1974 Australia beat Iran and South Korea in crucial matches, whilst in 1982 New Zealand defeated China in a play-off in Singapore. Neither team was particularly remarkable and they relied on their larger physique, as well as their greater experience, to overcome their opponents.

Since then a separate qualifying group has been set aside for Oceania, although crucially the region is not guaranteed a place in the finals. In 1986 the winners were forced to play-off against a European side, in 1990 against a South American opponent, and in 1994 against first Canada from CONCACAF and then Argentina. That there was no Oceania representative at the 1994 finals was therefore hardly surprising.

Australia has the best football set-up in the region thanks mainly to the large number of ethnic communities present in the country. Team names like St George Budapest, Sydney Croatia and Brunswick Juventus left no doubt as to their origin, but this has hampered the growth of the game amongst native Australians who see it largely as an alien sport. So worried have the authorities and the clubs been that many attempts have been made to drop the ethnic tags, but such moves never prove popular, or lasting.

Football faces stiff competition from a host of other sports in Australia. The national game is Australian Rules football, a hybrid of rugby, football and Gaelic football played on a pitch that often doubles as a cricket field, hence its enormous size. In typical Australian fashion however, 'Aussie Rules' is not played throughout the country but largely in the south, particularly in Victoria, as well as Western Australia; while in Queensland and New South Wales, rugby league is the number one code. Also competing for the attention of the public are cricket, rugby union and individual sports like athletics and swimming. Football has therefore taken a back seat, and until the 1960s played very little part in national life at all.

Between 1946 and 1960, 1.6 million immigrants made their way to Australia, mainly from Europe, and this was the initial boost the game needed. An association had been in existence since 1882, but it was replaced in 1961 by the current federation, in order to run the game at home in a more organised fashion and revive the national side, which had lain dormant for many years. From the late 1950s until 1976 each state ran its own league, the best being in New South Wales, Victoria and South Australia. In 1977 Australia finally got a national league, beneath which the state leagues continue to operate. The national league has never had an easy path. Gates are invariably low, except for the play-offs at the end of the season, and travel expenses are high, because of the vast size of the country. Although it is called the 'national' league, no teams from either Tasmania or Western Australia are included. In the latter's case, travel expenses would simply be prohibitive. In recent years the league has seen the rise of a number of Australian players who continue their careers in Europe, the most famous being Craig Johnston who won many honours with Liverpool.

In New Zealand, the second power in the region, football at least faces much more clear-cut opposition than in Australia. Rugby Union dominates the national sporting life to the almost complete exclusion of football. Only amongst the British community is it played with any great vigour. Formed in 1891, the New Zealand Football Association initially supervised a competition called the Brown Shield, but the most important development came in 1923 when a cup presented by the English naval ship HMS Chatham was introduced as an annual knockout competition for club sides. This remains a major feature on the fixture list and was joined in 1970 by a national championship. Despite very poor attendances, the national league has given a boost to the clubs in New Zealand, who up until that point, had played in poorly organised local leagues. It undoubtedly also helped the 'All Whites', as the national side is known in order to distinguish it from rugby's All Blacks, to qualify for the 1982 World Cup where they helped make their group one of the most entertaining in the tournament.

The future does not look very bright, however, for New Zealand or the rest of the Oceania members. The region was not granted an automatic berth in the expanded World Cup in 1998, although the winners this time might fancy their chances of winning the play-off against the fourth-placed Asian nation. At youth level, by contrast, the region has always had an automatic place in the two junior World Cups and the game at this level is flourishing, Australia, being particularly strong. At all levels, however, the Pacific island states will continue to flounder, for the incentive is simply not there without a real chance of qualification for the World Cup finals. Until then the oval ball, with its World Cup, will continue to increase in popularity at the expense of the round one.
